Hampshire, Hants, or County of Southampton, one of the southern counties of England, including the Isle of Wight [Wight, Isle of], from which the mainland portion is divided by the Solent and Spithead; mainly in the diocese of Winchester, but with small portions belonging to Oxford and Salisbury; cap. Winchester; other chief towns Southampton, Portsmouth, Aldershot, Bournemouth, Christchurch, Ryde, and Newport; divided into the following parl. divs.:—

	Acres.	Pop. 1891.
N. or Basingstoke	136,467	70,497
W. or Andover	276,333	51,223
E. or Petersfield	211,377	47,180
S. or Fareham	70,559	66,014
New Forest	213,884	51,328
Isle of Wight	93,342	78,672
Parl. bors.—
Christchurch	22,659	53,270
Portsmouth	4,320	159,251
Southampton	7,774	93,589
Winchester	1,049	19,073
Total (anct. and administrative co.)	1,037,764	690,097

Surface mainly under 500 ft. in height, and nowhere rising above 1000 ft. The county is traversed by the N. and S. Downs, which form pastures for large flocks of sheep. The Downs themselves and the intervening region belong entirely to the Chalk, but in the S. half of the county this formation gives place to early Tertiary deposits, principally to the Bagshot Beds (middle Eocene). The SW. of the county is chiefly occupied by the New Forest, and the whole county is well-wooded, and noted for its timber. The chief rivers are the Avon, Stour, Test, and Itchen, all entering the English Channel or its inlets. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9. The manufactures are unimportant, the shipbuilding yards of Portsmouth and Southampton Docks, and the carriage works of the L. & SW. R. at Eastleigh, excepted. Bank-note paper is made at Freefolk, watch chains at Christchurch, and in a few other places linseys, druggets, and bombazines. There are no minerals of economic importance. The railways belong chiefly to the South-Western system, and the NE. of the county is traversed by the Basingstoke Canal. Winchester was the ancient cap. of Wessex, and during the Saxon, Norman, and early Angevin dynasties cap. of England. In the 9th and 10th centuries H. was wasted by the Danes, and during the Parliamentary War was the scene of several battles and sieges. Antiquities (Roman, monastic, and castellated) are numerous, the chief being the Roman remains of Silchester, Netley and Beaulieu abbeys, and Porchester and Carisbrook castles. See England, table.

It contains the state-rooms, in which are some rich furniture and tapestry, and a superb collection of paintings, chiefly historical portraits. The palace is built of brick, with stone decorations. Its ceiling was painted by Verrio. The garden is laid out in the Dutch style; it has a fine terrace, some good sculpture, fountains, vases, and a grape-house, containing a vine said to be the largest and most productive in Europe. The park, 5 m. in circumference, is well stocked with deer. This palace was an occasional royal residence between the reigns of Henry VIII. and George II. Hangchow, or Hangchau-fu, tn., China, prov. Chekiang, at head of Hangchow Bay, 110 m. SW. Shanghai, at the mouth of the Tsientang-kiang, S. terminus of the Imperial or Grand Canal; extensive silk manufactures. The Kinsai, Kinsay, Kingtse, or Quinsay of Marco Polo. Opened to foreign commerce 1895 [Japan, end of article]. P. (estimated) 800,000.

Hangchow Bay, the largest inlet on the coast of China, S. of the Gulf of Pechili, about 130 m. long and 70 m. wide at the mouth, gradually narrowing towards its head, the upper part (above the narrowing, in about 121° E.) forming the estuary of the Tsientang-kiang. Numerous small islands off its mouth and in the bay, with lighthouses on one of the Saddle group, on Gützlaff I., and on Volcano I. (the last in the bay). On account of the violence of the bore which occurs at every tide in the estuary of the Tsientang (sometimes attaining at spring-tide, when the moon is in perigee, a height of 23 ft.) ships cannot ascend above Rambler I., in 120° 58′ E. The bore rushes with peculiar violence against the N. shore, which is protected by an embankment, at least 1000 years old, running past Haining to Hangchow, where the bore usually loses nearly all its violence, and is dangerous only to small boats. Another embankment protects the S. side of the estuary. (See Jour. China Branch Royal Asiatic Soc., 1888, vol. xxiii.). Gützlaff I. is connected by submarine cables with Nagasaki, Wusung, and Amoy.

Han-kiang, Han-ho, or Hang-kiang, riv., China, one of the chief tribs. of the Yangtse-kiang, rises in the mountains of Tsinling, in the SW. corner of Shensi prov., which it traverses from E. to W., then enters Hupé, in which it flows on the whole SE. to Hankow (Hankau), where it enters the Yangtse-kiang. Navigable in its lower course for large junks to Fancheng (q.v.), and for smaller vessels to Hanchung, in SW. of prov. Shensi, not far from its source. A boat journey from Hankau to Hanchung lasts 2½–5 months (Proc. R. G. S., 1890, p. 64). Towards the middle of its course the Han-kiang traverses a chain of mountains rich in coal and slate, here forming 360 rapids.

Hankison, vil., U.S., N. Dakota, Richland co., 55 m. S. by W. Fargo. P.<1500.

Hankow, or Hankau ('Han-mouth'), treaty port of China since 1861, the natural focus of the export and import trade with the central and western provs., on the north bank of the Yangtse, 700 English miles from its mouth, and at the confluence with it of the Han-kiang, in 30° 33′ N., 114° 19′ E. It faces Hanyang city across the Han, and Wuchang across the Yangtse. It remained an unwalled town till 1863, when an attack of the roving banditti of the northern provs. being apprehended, a wall of stone, 13 ft. high, with a brick parapet 5 ft. high, was built around it. The British settlement is now covered with palatial buildings, to the E. of which is the British consular establishment. The port is accessible to large ocean steamers; greatest recorded depth at the entrance, 48 ft. 3 in. Vessels loaded and discharged by lighters. Average value of exports, including re-exports, about £7,000,000; principal article, black tea; next in importance, raw silk, medicines, wood-oil. Since the opening of the port the town has been three times submerged—in 1866, 1869, and 1870—each inundation leading to an outbreak of fever. Mean temp. (5 yrs., 1877–81), yr. 62.2° F., Jan. 37.90°, July 84°. P. 300,000; joint P. of H., Hanyang, and Wuchang, 1,200,000.

Hanover, German Hannover (name derived from honover, 'high bank' [alta ripa]), prov., Prussia, situated in NW. Germany, between Holland and the Elbe. Only the southern parts are hilly and mountainous (Harz Mts. [q.v.], Weser Mts., Deister, Solling Forest, hills of Schöppingen, and Bentheim), the greater part of H. belonging to the N. German Plain. The characteristic features of this portion of the plain are heaths (heath of Lüneburg), marshland, swamps, and peat-bogs (morass of Bourtange, 540 sq. m.; 'floating fields' in the terr. of the Hamme R.). The marshland is well drained, and very fertile. Much has been done in recent times to cultivate the bog land, and large tracts of fertile land have been reclaimed (Papenburg and dists. E. of Bremen); also on the coast land has been recovered in many places, the dykes of western H. ('German Friesland') being not less remarkable than those of Holland. Navigable rivers: Elbe (with Ilmenau and Oste), Weser (with Aller and Leine), and Ems (with Haase). Canals are numerous, the principal ones being the Bremen, Hadeln, Ems, and Ems-Vechte Canals (see also Oldenburg). H. has only a few small lakes, viz., the Steinhud, Bederkesa, and Dümmersee. The climate varies greatly in the different parts of the prov. It is moist on the coast, mild in the plain, and bleak on the Harz Mts. (q.v.). The southern parts are rich in valuable minerals (see Harz); coal and lignite occur near Osnabrück, Osterwald, and Weetzen; salt is found near Egestorfshall and Neuhall; and petroleum at Ölheim, S. of Celle. Enormous quantities of peat are met with, and used as fuel in the northern parts of H. Agriculture (cereals, flax, hemp), cattle-rearing, and horse-breeding are in many parts of the prov. in a flourishing state (especially in the well drained marshlands). Industries and commerce are likewise of importance; textiles, pig-iron, machinery, hardware, chemicals, and cigars being the principal manufactures. Hanover, Linden, Osnabrück, Hameln, Geestemünde, Harburg, Osterode, Hildesheim, and Celle are the principal industrial and commercial centres. Göttingen is a famous university-town. The railways mostly belong to the state. Most of the inhabitants of H. are Protestants. In the early times of the Middle Ages H. was a part of the duchy of Brunswick (q.v.); 1569–92, William, founder of the line Brunswick-Lüneburg; 1714, George Ludwig (1698–1727), King of England (George I. 1714–27); 1815, H. kingdom; 1866, H. prov. of Prussia (q.v.). Area, 14,862 sq. m. P. (1890) 2,278,361. See German Empire. [H. G. S.]

Hanover, tn., cap. Prussian prov. and govt. (Regierungsbezirk) H., on the Leine, 80 m. S. by W. Hamburg. It is a well-built town, with beautiful parks and suburbs, containing a royal library of 175,000 volumes, several picture-galleries, a provincial museum, with collections of the historical society for Lower Saxony, the Kestner museum, with collections of Etruscan, Roman, and Greek antiquities, a zoological garden (in the Eilenriede Forest E. of the town), &c. H. was first made a ducal residence by Duke George in 1641, but even after that its growth was slow, its rapid development dating from about the year 1845. As a manufacturing town H. is rapidly rising into importance (cotton-mills, dye works, chemical works, foundries, machine shops). Mean temp., yr. 48.5° F., Jan. 34.2°, July 65.4°; rfall. Harz, Teutonic, a 'wood.' See Hart.

Harz (name indicating 'forest-mountains'), the most northern of the mountain groups of central Germany, situated between the rivs. Saale and Leine. The H. forms an isolated and picturesque plateau, sloping steeply on all sides to the N. German Plain. Its principal direction is from ESE. to WNW. (total length, 60 m.). The H. is divided into two parts, 'Oberharz' (NW. portion) and 'Unterharz' (SE. portion), the former containing the highest elevations (Brocken, 3745 ft.; Heinrichshöhe, 3420 ft.; Königsberg, 3375 ft.; Bruchberg, 3040 ft.). Geologically the H. consists of Palæozoic rocks, surrounded at the edges by Mesozoic formations, and pierced in many places by volcanic rocks. Granite occurs only at three places, the most important being the Brocken Mt. and the dist. round it. The H. is celebrated for its wealth in valuable minerals, argentiferous lead and copper ores being met with in many places. Principal mining localities: Rammelsberg, near Goslar (mines worked since the 10th century), Zellerfeld, Klausthal, St. Andreasberg (Samson shaft, 2800 ft. deep), and Harzgerode. Very rich copper ores are found near Mansfeld, on the eastern slopes of the Harz Mts.; iron is obtained at various places of the Unterharz; and coal-measures occur at Meisdorf, Grillenberg, and Ilfeld. The climate is bleak, and the mountains are but thinly peopled. [H. G. S.]

Harzburg, or Neustadt, tn., Ger., duchy and 26 m. S. Brunswick, 6 m. ESE. Goslar, in a beautiful situation at the N. base of the Harz Mts.; a much frequented health-resort, with whey-cure, pine-needle cure, and other establishments. Near it the strong brine-springs of Julius-hall. H. is properly a collective name for the three adjoining villages of Neustadt, Bündheim, and Schlewecke, which succeed one another in that order from SE. to NW. P. (of group) 5600; P. (Neustadt) <3000.

Hastings (named, according to Camden, after a Danish seaking, who conquered, built, and fortified the place), parl. bor. (1 member), mun. bor. (since the time of Elizabeth), co. bor., and one of the Cinque Ports, now a fishing tn., Eng., Sussex, Rye div., on the S. ct., 8½ m. SW. Rye, on the L. B. & S. C. (the eastern terminus) and SE. Rlys. The old town lies in a valley between two hills, the shelter afforded by which obtained for this older part (now little frequented by visitors) the reputation of being a mild winter resort. The new part of the bor., part of which is called St. Leonards, is in a direct line along the shore to the westward. There are two piers, large tepid swimming baths, and the remains of an ancient castle crown the eastern of the two hills enclosing the old town. In 1360 the town suffered from the French, and lost its importance, but it has gradually become celebrated as a watering-place during the present century. Market-day, S. Mean rfall. Hauraki Gulf, New Zealand, North I., prov. Auckland, on the E. ct., is an extensive inlet of the Pacific, 70 m. long, breadth, 40 m; contains numerous well-wooded islands and several excellent harbours, on one of which (Waitemata) the town of Auckland is situated. The Great Barrier I. forms a good outer breakwater.

Hauran (Heb. Chauran, 'the hollow land,' from its numerous caves), Syria, comprises in its greater acceptation all the mountainous plateau which extends E. from the Jordan and the Sea of Tiberias, and S. of Mount Hermon. It is entirely of igneous origin, and consists of large plains and mountain ranges, with isolated eminences rising steeply from the valley of the Jordan to a mean altitude of about 2000 ft. above the Mediterranean. The H. proper, about 50 m. in length and the same in breadth, situated E. of the Sea of Tiberias, comprises the plain of En. Nukrah (the ancient Auranitis), Jebel Hauran, or Bathanieh, and the Lejah (the Trachonitis of the Greeks, and Argob of the Hebrews, both meaning 'country of rocks'), the whole being the 'Land of Bashan' and the 'Country of the Rephaim' of the O. T. The soil is excellent, and in rainy years the plain is extremely productive; wheat is grown, 300 shiploads of which are said to leave here every year. A railway is constructing from Damascus to Mezerib in the heart of the plain. The elevated volcanic massif of Jebel H., which culminates in the Jebel Juweilil (5847 ft.), gives rise to numerous streams on its S. and W. slopes, which unite lower down to form the Yarmuk. This region is no less remarkable for its geological structure than for the infinite number and peculiar character of the ruined sites with which it is covered. El Lejah ('the refuge') lies NW. of Jebel H., and extends for 25 m. towards Damascus. The entire surface consists of lava which has flowed from the mountain cracked and scored by innumerable crevasses in all directions, and so thickly strewed with loose sharp rocks as to be almost impassable, with a multitude of caverns in its flanks, which have been frequently made use of as places of refuge. The whole country is inhabited only by wandering Beduins and a few colonies of Druses, who reside in the neighbourhood of Jebel H. and the borders of the Lejah, where they are better able to defend themselves against the incursions of the Beduins and the exactions of the Turkish pashas than in the plains. It is full of the remains of ancient cities and various monuments, chiefly of the Greek and Roman periods.

Havana (founded in 1519 under the name of 'San Cristobal de la Habana,' or Savanna), frequently spelt in English Havanna, or Havannah, seapt., on the NW. ct. of Cuba, cap. of the prov. of H., and of the whole island, the most important town of the W. Indies and Central America, in the commercial centre of the three Americas (llave del Nuevo Mundo, 'the New World's Key'), in front of the Mississippi valley, at the starting-point of the Gulf Stream to Europe; built on one of two penins. forming the entrance (1100 ft. wide and 4200 ft. long, turned to NNW.) of a large harbour (Puerto de Carenas), internally divided into several bays (Ensenadas de Merimelena, Guasabacoa, Tallapiedra), protected against almost all winds (although both the town and the harbour have been already destroyed by cyclonic storms). Depth of harbour, 15 ft. (right under the W. shore) to 30 ft. (at the entrance). The entrance and the sea approaches, surrounded by hills (some about 1000 ft. alt.), are well fortified. H. has a university, a meteorological observatory, cathedral, government buildings, &c., large manufactures of tobacco and sugar. Place of convergence of three lines of railway. The surroundings, with the country residences, are very fertile. H. is very unhealthy, the yellow fever being there endemic. Mean temp. (19 yrs., 1858–76), yr. 78.5° F., Jan. 72.6°, July 83.7°; rfall. (25 yrs.), 46.5 in. P. of prov. 440,000; of town, 200,000 (one-sixth of the total population of Cuba). [J. B. R.]

Havre, Le (formerly Havre de Grace), city and fortified seapt., France, dep. Seine-Inférieure, cap. arr., on the N. bank of the estuary of the Seine, at its mouth in the English Channel, and at the terminus of railway, 108 m. NW. Paris, and 44 m. W. Rouen. The city is built on level ground rising to the N. and W., and has been greatly improved in recent years; public promenades and noble boulevards have been laid out on the site of the old fortifications, and its present appearance is that of a handsome modern town. The port is, next to Marseilles, the most important in France. It comprises a tidal harbour and 10 docks, with a floating dock and 6 dry docks, the largest of which can receive a vessel 550 ft. long. In the outer harbour there is at spring tides about 32 ft. 2 in. of water, and at neap tides 25 ft. 11 in.; while at the entrance of the two principal docks, the Bassins de l'Eure and de la Citadelle, there is respectively at spring tides 35 ft. and 31 ft., and at neap tides 29 ft. 6 in. and 25 ft. 6 in. The entrance is open to the SW., bounded by two piers, with a lighthouse on the N. one visible 10 m. Projects of extensive works for the improvement of the port are in contemplation, including the construction of a breakwater and a new entrance, and other large docks. As to the Havre-Tancarville Canal, see Seine, riv. Numerous steam packets ply regularly between H. and the ports of France, England, and N. and S. America. It is the leading French port as regards the value of its exports (nearly £30,000,000), though behind Marseilles in respect of the value of its imports. Large forts have been erected since 1858 on the heights above the town, and the lofty chalk cliffs of Cape la Hève on the W. are crowned by two lighthouses with electric lights, visible 27 m. H. was founded by Louis XII. in 1509, held by the English in 1562, but relinquished in the following year after an obstinate siege, and bombarded by them in 1678 and 1759. P. Hawaii, the largest and southernmost of the Sandwich Islands (q.v.), Pacific Ocean, between lat. 18° 53′ and 20° 15′ N., long. 154° 50′ and 156° 4′ W. It is a vast mass of volcanic rock and lava, and contains several lofty peaks. Mauna Kea (13,953 ft.) is now quiescent; but Mauna Loa (13,760 ft.) has had several eruptions during the present century, that of 1868 being particularly terrible; and Kilauea (4250 ft.), on the flank of the latter, has a crater 2 m. in length by 1½ m. broad, which is a continual lake of fire in constant agitation. The middle of the island consists of a wild rugged plateau, without inhabitants. The NE. ct. is watered by numerous streams, and the soil is very fertile, in which sugar-cane and other tropical products are cultivated. In the extreme N. are excellent pastures, but the W. face of the plateau is completely arid and waterless. Chief town, Hilo, on the E. ct. Hebrides, or Western Islands (ancient Ebudæ, and in Celtic Innse Gall, 'the isles of the strangers,' during the Norse occupation), a series of isls. off the W. ct. of Scot., between 55° 35′ and 58° 30′ N., 5° 40′ and 8° 40′ W., and consisting of two principal groups: the Outer H.—Lewis, Harris, N. and S. Uist, Benbecula, Barra, and numerous smaller islands in the counties Ross and Inverness, collectively known as the 'Long Island,' 130 m. in length, 1 to 30 m. broad; and the Inner H., which are more scattered and irregularly disposed—Skye, Rum, Eig, Canna, Coll, Tiree, Mull, Iona, Colonsay, Jura, Islay, &c., partly separated from the former by the channel termed the Little Minch, and lying more immediately off the shores of Inverness and Argyll, in which counties they are included; the small St. Kilda group, lying 60 m. W. of the Outer H., is also comprised within their area. Geologically, the H. are divided into several groups. The Gneiss Islands comprehend the whole of the Outer H., Tiree, Coll, Iona, &c. The Trap Islands are Skye, Rum, Eig, Canna, Mull, Ulva, Staffa, and St. Kilda. The Slate Islands are Islay, Jura, Gigha, Colonsay, &c. An intermittent range of high hills traverses the E. side of the Long I., which is deeply indented by arms of the sea, while low moors, studded with shallow lakes, lie between the hills and the Atlantic. Sand-dunes prevail to a great extent on the coasts of all the islands, more especially on the W. (For an explanation of the origin of these sand-dunes, see Scot. Geog. Mag., 1886, p. 474.) The Inner H. are generally mountainous. Climate moist in Outer H.; much rain in winter, but little snow. Soil of the Gneiss Is. poor, and often peat-moss; the trap and sandstone islands are more fertile. Population for the most part Celtic, and generally in the greatest poverty, four-fifths subsisting almost wholly on potatoes and fish. The introduction of steam navigation has contributed very much to the improvement of the Inner H. The herring fishery, formerly an important resource of the people, has greatly declined, as has also the manufacture of kelp, of which at the beginning of the present century nearly 6000 tons were produced, realising sometimes £20 per ton. The rearing of cattle and sheep is the most profitable branch of industry. Live stock, ponies, kelp, wool, cod, ling, herrings, limestone, and slate are the chief exports; imports are iron, groceries, salt, oatmeal, and in some of the islands peat-fuel. In the Outer H. especially, most of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics. Principal villages, Stornoway in Lewis, Portree in Skye, Tobermory in Mull. These islands were ruled mostly by sovereigns of Norwegian descent (by whom they were known as The Sudreys, 'southern islands') from the 9th century till 1264, when they were annexed to the crown of Scotland. The islands are visited by large numbers of tourists in the summer, and regular steamboat communication is carried on with Glasgow throughout the year. The principal islands are noticed under their respective names.

Hecla, or Hekla, Mount (Icelandic hekla, 'a mantle' or 'cap,' because the peak is generally enveloped in a thick shroud of clouds), volcano of Iceland, near its SW. ct., in 63° 59′ N., 19° 42′ W. It rises by three or four terraces to an alt. of 5096 ft., with three small craters near its summit, and is surrounded by vast fields of lava, covering an area of 262 sq. m.; the crater of its principal peak does not much exceed 100 ft. in depth. It is composed chiefly of basalt and lava; but slag-sand and loose ashes cover a great part of its surface, and obsidian is among its most remarkable products. Eighteen eruptions are recorded within historic times, some of which have been of extreme violence, and continued for months, but the mountain is almost constantly in a convulsed state; the latest eruption took place in 1875.

Hegyalja, or Hegyallya, chain of hills, Hungary, forming the extremity of an offshoot of the Carpathians, which extend S. between the Bodrog and the Hernad Rivs., and between 48° and 49° N. This is the Côte d'Or of Hungary, and produces the celebrated Tokay wines. The wine-growing dist. is about 90 sq. m. in extent.

He-ho, Kimtu-ho, Nam-Tei, Song-bo, or Black River, Tongking, is the principal affluent of the Song-koi. It rises in Yünnan, but its sources are unknown, flows SE. for the greater part of its course to near Chobo, then E., and subsequently N., joining the Song-koi on its r. bk. 40 m. above Hanoi, where it is considerably larger than the so-called main stream. Above Chobo it flows through a mountainous region, and its valley is precipitous and gloomy, with many rapids in the river-bed; afterwards the country alters in character and becomes open, fertile, and thickly populated. It is navigable by steamers to above Chobo, about 35 m. from its mouth, where a barrage of rocks prevents further passage. See Proc. R. G. S., 1886, p. 219, and 1891, p. 716.

Helmand, Helmund, Helmend, or Hilmend (the ancient Etymander), riv., Afghanistan, rises in the Paghman Mts., 35 m. W. Kabul, at an elevation of 11,500 ft., flows SW. 250 m. through a mountainous region, in which a great deal of its course is unknown, to Girishk (2880 ft.), thence S. and WSW., dividing the great desert country of Afghanistan, and finally N. through Seistan into the Hamun-i-Sawaran, after a course of about 700 m. At Girishk, 70 m. W. Kandahar, it is, in spring, 1000 yards broad, with a depth of 10 or 12 ft., and a powerful and rapid current, but in the dry season (Oct.) reduced to 350 yards and 3 ft. deep; whilst at Khwaja Ali, about 180 m. below Girishk, it was only 100 yards wide, and easily fordable by camels in the same month. Its valley through the desert, in which it does not receive a single trib., is generally 3–5 m. in width, but widens after passing Rudbar. Its banks are fertile, and abound almost everywhere with traces of former cultivation and wealth; but at a little distance the country on either side is a mere arid waste. Very much of the river is absorbed by irrigation; and at Band-i-Kamal Khan in times of extreme flood its water escapes into the western Hamun along a trough which was probably the former normal course of the river. Principal tribs. the Arghandáb (q.v.). Area of basin, 90,000 sq. m.

Herat, ancient Aria, or Artacoana, the Haraêva of the Zendavesta, fortified city, Afghanistan, in the NW., on r. bk. of the Heri Rud, 410 m. W. Kabul. It is built on an artificial mound, nearly 1 m. square and 60 ft. in height, above a plain, in a well-irrigated and carefully cultivated valley, about 120 m. long by 12 m. wide. Its geographical position, near the only passage for large bodies of troops from the N. towards India, and as being the only place in this part of central Asia where an army could be fed, renders the site of great strategical importance; and from the same cause it is also the emporium for a large commerce from India and Persia to the Caspian Sea and the countries to the E. The town is abundantly supplied with excellent water, but its sanitary condition is very bad. Manufactures comprise silk, woollen and leather goods, carpets, &c. H. was for long the cap. of the extensive empire ruled by the descendants of Timur; and probably no city in central Asia has sustained so many sieges, and been so often destroyed and depopulated (in former times it is said to have contained 100,000 inhabitants); the present city is believed to be the seventh occupying the same site. In 1863 it was finally taken by the Amir of Afghanistan, in whose hands it has since remained; and its fortifications and defences have lately been materially strengthened. A carriage road has recently been constructed from H. to Meshed, a distance of 230 m. Owing to the difficulties upon the direct routes between H. and Kabul, caravans prefer the longer journey by Kandahar. The inhabitants are chiefly of the Persian race; the number of true Afghans is inconsiderable. Alt. 3026 ft. (Curzon). P. 12,000, besides large garrison.

Hérault, maritime dep., in the S. of France, forming the NW. ct. of the Gulf of Lions, divided into four arrs.: Montpellier, cap., Béziers, Lodève, and Saint-Pons. The surface of the dep. is varied. From the sandy shore of the Mediterranean rise two isolated hills, the Pilier de Saint-Clair, and the small extinct volcano of Saint-Loup (formerly an islet at the mouth of the riv. H.). Beyond this sandy tract lie a series of pools (étangs) (the chief being those of Thau, Frontignan, Maguelonne, Pérols, and Mauguio), communicating with the sea by means of channels, locally called graus, and in the SE. the two freshwater but insalubrious pools of Capestang and Vendres. Beyond these pools again extend plains and hills, and finally in the NW. rise the Monts de l'Espinousse (including a peak, above the source of the Agout, alt. 3680 ft., the highest summit of the dep.), the Garrigues, and a portion of the high plateau of Larzac. Following the coast from SW. to NE., the rivers of the dep. are the Aude (which merely touches the frontier), Orb, and Hérault. Climate of the Mediterranean type [Montpellier]. Principal cereals wheat and oats, the production of which per acre is, however, much under the average for France. The production of wine, on the other hand, is still greater than in any other dep., though the vineyards have suffered severely from the phylloxera (average, 1869–78, 244 million gallons; 1890, 132 million gallons). Silkworms are reared, and the olive cultivated. The principal mineral resources are coal (Graissessac basin) and sea-salt. There are mineral waters at Lamalou, Balaruc-les-Bains (near Cette), Montmajou (comm. of Cazouls-lès-Béziers), and Fontcaude (comm. Juvignac). The chief manufacture is that of brandy; coarse cloths (Lodève and Clermont) and soap are also manufactured. Area, 2403 sq. m. P. (1891) 461,700. See France, table.

Hérault, riv., France, rises in the Cevennes, dep. Gard, flows on the whole SSW., and enters the Mediterranean near Agde, to which town it is navigable for steamers. Surface undulating, mainly below 500 ft. in height, but rising to more than 1000 ft. where there are ranges of hills stretching from NW. to SE., traversed in the same direction by the riv. Dore, and now also by the Golden Valley Rly. The rocks are mainly Old Red Sandstone, with small patches of Silurian in the SE., and a more considerable area belonging to the same system in the NW., where the line of separation is approximately marked by a line drawn from Ludlow (Shropshire) to Kington. The chief rivers are the Wye, traversing the county from W. to SE., and its trib. the Lugg, which enters from the NW., flowing E. then on the whole S., entering the Wye E. of Hereford, near the middle of the county. The G. W. R., M. R., and L. & NW. R. all have lines running through the county in connection with their systems. The orchards, which cover a larger proportion of the surface (about 5 per cent.) than in any other county in England, yield good cider and perry, and timber is abundant (woods and plantations nearly 7½ per cent. of the surface). H. is noted for its breed of oxen. For agriculture, see Appendix, pp. 7–9. No minerals of economic importance. H. formed a part of the ancient British Siluria, and was one of the last provinces which submitted to the Saxons, under whom it formed a part of Mercia. See England, table.

Heri-Rud, or Hury, riv., the ancient Arius, riv., N. Afghanistan, rises in the Kuh-i-Baba, at about 12,000 ft. above sea-level, flows W. in a broad valley to Herat, nearly 300 m. The great dam near this diverts a considerable amount of the water into canals for the irrigation of the fertile Herat valley. Lower down the valley contracts, and the river flows in places in narrow defiles. Near Kuhsan the river turns N., and its valley is of very varying width to Pul-i-Khatun, its channel being about 120 ft. broad. The water is high during the winter months, but rapidly diminishes, and in the summer only a reach of shallow water is preserved in places between Kuhsan and Pul-i-Khatun, but an underground stream exists. At the latter place the current re-commences, fed by the Keshef Rud (from the W.) and numerous abundant springs, and is again used for irrigation at Sarakhs, where the supply is uninterrupted all the year round. Beyond Sarakhs the river takes the name of Tejend, and flows NW. until it is finally lost in marshes at the S. edge of the Kara-kum desert. [1] The administrative county includes also the part of E. Barnet Valley and part of Barnet, urban sanitary dists. in the ancient county of Middlesex. Area, 406,932 ac. P. 224,550.

Surface for the most part gently undulating, except in the W., where it approaches the Chiltern Hills, and in an isolated rising in the NE. below 500 ft. in height. Belongs mainly to the Upper Cretaceous rocks, which give place in the SE., S., and in isolated patches in the SW., to the London clay. The principal rivers are the Lee and Colne, with their tribs. The main lines of the L. & NW. R., M. R., G. N. R., and G. E. R. (to Cambridge), and part of the Grand Junction Canal, all traverses the county. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9. The principal manufactures are straw-plait, silk, and paper, together with brewing, tanning, currying, parchment-making, brick, tile, and earthenware making, coach-building, and lace-making. Apart from brick-earth, H. has no minerals of great economic importance. In 896 a severe contest took place in this county between King Alfred and the Danes, and during the Wars of the Roses three great battles, two at St. Albans, one at Barnet, were fought here. Hesse, or Hesse-Darmstadt, in German Hessen (origin of name 'Hesse' differently explained, and doubtful: either Hassen = Chatten; or hattr = (English) hat, from peculiar ancient headgear; or hassen = woodmen, hunters), gd.-duchy, W. Ger., in size and population sixth state of the German Empire (g.v.). It consists of two separate parts, situated respectively S. (provs. of Starkenburg and Rheinhessen) and N. (prov. of Oberhessen) of the riv. Main. The surface of the soil varies greatly, Oberhessen and E. Starkenburg being mountainous (Vogelsberg with Taufstein, 2530 ft.; Odenwald with Melibocus, 1700 ft.), whilst W. Starkenburg and Rheinhessen form part of the Rhine Plain ('Oberrheinische Tiefebene'). The principal river of H.-D. is the Rhine, all other rivers being tributary to it, with the exception of those rising N. and E. of the Vogelsberg, which flow to the Weser. The climate differs considerably; it is mild in the Rhine Plain, and bleak on the heights of the Odenwald and Vogelsberg. H.-D. is principally an agricultural country; 49½ per cent. of its area is cultivated soil, which is very productive, and eminently adapted for the cultivation of cereals, potatoes, and vegetables. Excellent wines are produced in Rheinhessen (Bingen, Oppenheim, Mayence) and on the western slopes of the Odenwald (Bergstrasse). Forests cover not less than 31 per cent. of the surface of H.-D., oaks, beeches, and pines being the principal trees. Cattle-rearing is of considerable importance. The mineral production of H.-D. is limited, salt being worked at Ludwigshall, Bad-Nauheim, and Theodorshall, and lignite and iron ores occurring at various places in Oberhessen. Industrial centres of importance are Mayence and Darmstadt (cap. of H.-D.), the principal manufactures being leather goods, furniture, machinery, beer, chemical products, tobacco, and cigars. Two-thirds of the inhabitants are Protestants, one-third Roman Catholics. There is a university at Giessen, and a technical high-school at Darmstadt. Founder of the present reigning line is George I. (A.D. 1567). During the Thirty Years' War H.-D. suffered greatly. After having joined the Confederation of the Rhine, H.-D. was made a gd.-duchy in 1806. Since 1871 it has belonged to the German Empire (g.v.). [H. G. S.]

Hessen, vil., Ger., duchy Brunswick, circle and 14 m. SE. Wolfenbüttel. P. <3000.

Hesse-Nassau, prov., Prussia, situated in W. Ger., N. of the riv. Main, and between the rivs. Rhine and Werra. It is mountainous and hilly; Taunus (Grosser Feldberg, 2890 ft.), Westerwald (Fuchskanten, 2155 ft.), Rhöngebirge (Wasserkuppe, 3115 ft.), and in the northern parts of the prov. the so-called Hessian Mts., consisting of a number of isolated mountain groups (Meissner, 2460 ft.; Kaufungerwald, 2100 ft.; Knüll Mts., 2085 ft., &c.). All rivers of H.-N. are tribs. of the Rhine and Weser. The climate is that of central Germany. Agriculture and cattle-rearing are of considerable importance, 39½ per cent. of the surface of H.-N. being cultivated soil, and 16 per cent. pastures and meadows. Timber is plentiful, H.-N. having more forests (40 per cent. of its total area) than any other prov. of Prussia; the principal trees are beeches, oaks, and conifers. Excellent wines are produced in the 'Rheingau' (Hochheim, Johannisberg, Rüdesheim). The mineral production of H.-N. is considerable. Large iron ore deposits occur on the Lahn between Dietz and Wetzlar, and on the Dill, near Dillenburg. On the Lahn are also found manganese ores and argentiferous lead ores. Wealden coal occurs near Rinteln, and lignite in the Kaufungerwald and Habichtswald. Clay of excellent quality is found at Grossalmerode. Mineral waters occur at various places, the brine springs of Wiesbaden and the soda-bicarbonate springs of Ems being famous. Manufacturing industries are of importance in various parts of the prov., the principal manufactures being machinery, pottery, leather goods, iron ware, chemicals, and textiles. The cap. of H.-N. is Kassel. Other towns of importance are Wiesbaden, Frankfurt on the Main, Hanau, Homburg, Fulda, and Marburg (university). H.-N. comprises a number of formerly independent German states, viz., the electorate of Hesse, the duchy of Nassau, the landgraviate of Hesse-Homburg, and the free imperial city of Frankfurt. Hexham, market-tn. and par., Eng., Northumberland, H. div., on the Tyne, 20 m. W. Newcastle, on the NE. R. and N. B. R. Has ruins of the old priory church of St. Wilfrid (now known as H. Abbey), built towards the close of the 7th century. The church had in the Middle Ages the privilege of sanctuary, and a fridstool, the sitting on which made the right of sanctuary peculiarly sacred, so that no money atonement was accepted for its breach, is still preserved there. From 675 to the early part of the 9th century H. was the seat of a bishop, but the bishopric was then merged in that of Lindisfarne, and afterwards with it in that of Durham. It is now included in the see of Newcastle. A dist. round H., known as Hexhamshire, was a separate liberty till about the close of the 16th century, when it was united to Northumberland. Near the town the Yorkists defeated the Lancastrians in 1463. The town has manufactures of tan gloves and hats, and there are barytes and coal-mines near. Market-days, Tu. and S. Himálayas (Sanskrit, 'the abode of snow,' the first element of the name, Sanskrit hima, 'frost,' reappearing in the Latin hiems, in the Imaus of Pliny, and the Emodus or Emodi Montes of Ptolemy), the name of the lofty mountain system containing the highest known peaks in the world, extending for 1600 m. from the extreme N. to the extreme E. of India, with a general trend from WNW. to ENE., but with a gentle curve convex towards the SW., which alters the general trend considerably in different sections. As it communicates with complicated mountainous regions both in the E. and W., its limits must be fixed more or less arbitrarily. In the W. the Indus valley may be conveniently taken as the limit of the system S. of that part of the valley of the Indus which slopes from SE. to NW., that is, as the limit of what is generally considered as the H. proper. That valley here marks approximately the place where the general trend of the mountains changes from south-easterly to south-westerly. But the mountains N. of the upper portion of the Indus valley extending to the upper valley of the Yarkand or Zarafshan, forming a broad and generally very elevated region, belongs to the same great mountain system, and for this portion it is more difficult to fix a limit. On the whole, it is most in consonance with topographical features and general usage to take as the limit the Barogil and Darkot passes, lying nearly opposite to each other, in about 73½° E., near the head of the Chitral or Yarkhun valley, and S. of the Darkot Pass, the Yasin valley, and the valley of the Gilghit to its junction with the Indus. In the E., all that is known is that the main axis of the H. extends beyond the gorge of the Brahmaputra, but comes to an end somewhere between 95° and 97° E., where the general trend of the mountains becomes southerly. The whole of the valley of the Sanpu, or Upper Brahmaputra, may be regarded as lying N. of the system. The breadth of the H. taken within these limits is greatest in the NW. (270–300 m.), least in the E. (about 150 m.). The subdivisions of the H. are even more difficult to determine, especially since the system is still in some large areas very imperfectly known. Colonel Godwin-Austen has attempted a classification based upon geological structure (see Proc. R. G. S., 1883, p. 610, and 1884, p. 83, with map), the main divisions being marked by the strike of the granitoid or gneissic rocks. Within the limits adopted in this article are classified as Trans-Himalayan, Himalayan, Outer or Lower Himalayan, and Sub-Himalayan, the last being entirely of recent geological origin. The Trans-Himalayan ranges lie mainly N. of the Indus, and are continued eastwards by ranges lying N. of the Sanpu. Two principal subdivisions of these ranges may be mentioned, the Mustagh range, stretching SE. from the Barogil Pass, and the Ladákh range, stretching in the W. between the Indus and the Shaiok, but continued eastwards along the S. side of the Indus valley, and finally S. of the Sutlej, terminating in the Gurla Peak (Gurla Mandhata, 25,360 ft.), S. of Lakes Manasarowar. The Himalayan range lies entirely S. of the Indus and the Brahmaputra, and the Outer Himalayan still further S. Between these granitic axes sedimentary deposits have been laid down; subsequent to which, elevation and lateral compression have taken place at different places at different times, affecting now larger and now smaller areas of the whole system. The elevation has proceeded so slowly in many places, as to allow of rivers deepening their beds as the mountains were raised, and thus preserving their original course. At the same time, it is in a large measure of recent date. Throughout the system marine deposits of miocene age (in a great measure composed of nummulitic limestone) are found more or less developed, in some places very extensively. About the W. end of the Outer Himálayas, in the SW. of Kashmír, such deposits have been raised to the height of 11,200 ft. Within the rock-basins are pliocene and post-pliocene beds of great thickness, containing in certain places a wonderfully rich and interesting fauna, but these are of fresh-water origin. Of fresh-water origin, too (late Tertiary), is the Sub-Himalayan ridge, which runs parallel to the H. proper along their whole extent from Attock in the Punjab to the E. of Assam, with only one break of about 50 m. to the E. of the Tísta (in the NE. of Bengal), a ridge separated from the true H. by a line of valleys called in most places the dúns (in Nepál, maris), but E. of the gap just referred to, the dwárs. The whole of this ridge as a topographical and geological feature is called by Colonel Godwin-Austen the Siwálik Hills (q.v.). In consequence of the numerous changes in the physical features, brought about by the forces of upheaval and compression, the divisions of Colonel Godwin-Austen do no correspond very closely with the topography. Another division is based primarily upon the hydrography of the region (see Geog. Mag., 1877, p. 173). According to it, the true H. of Colonel Godwin-Austen, that is, the Himálayas S. of the Indus and Sanpu, are divided into two chains, the northern of which is composed mainly of the water-parting S. of the Upper Indus and Upper Brahmaputra, a water-parting broken only by the gorge of the Sutlej, and the other of which is formed by joining in a line the highest peaks of this part of the system. This mode of division is convenient for purposes of description, and refers to an important physical feature of the system, inasmuch as all the tribs. of the Indus, except the Sutlej, and the Ganges and all its chief northern tribs., rise in the interval between these chains, many of the valleys of these rivers affording convenient routes into the intervening region. On the other hand, they are not to be regarded as chains in the strict sense of the term. The H. generally are conceived by General Strachey rather as a series of parallel chains oblique to the main direction of the whole mass, the drainage of which is through gorges at the western and loftier ends of these chains, the water-parting following the lower parts of the ridge. The term chains being used, however, for convenience for two series of heights as above explained, these are sometimes known respectively as the N. and S. chains; but a third chain, composed of the most northerly and the longest and loftiest crest N. of the Indus, called sometimes the Karakoram, and sometimes the Mustagh or Muztagh range, is by some reckoned as the N. chain of the H., in which case the first of the other two is spoken of as the central chain. Both Karakoram and Mustagh are properly the names of passes in the water-parting, the Karakoram (alt. 18,550 ft.), in about 77° 50′ E., 35° 30′ N., on the main route from India to Eastern Turkistan; Mustagh, the name of two passes, a new (alt. 18,400 ft.), in about 35° 40′ N., 76½° E., the old, a few m. to the E. (alt. about 19,000 ft.). The highest peak on the crest or water-parting in this range is Mount Godwin-Austen (K²) (alt. 28,265 ft.), to the E. of the Mustagh passes. Other lofty peaks adjoining are Gusherbrum (26,378 ft.), SE. of Mount Godwin-Austen, and Masherbrum (25,600 ft.), to the S. of the Mustagh passes. The more important of the other passes of the western H. both N. and S. of the Indus, are named in the article Kashmír. Among the more important peaks are Rakaposhi (25,500 ft.), 'a great needle,' between the Indus and the Kanjut or Hunza R., another mountain belonging to the Mustagh system, though not on the crest of the range; Nanga Parbat (26,620 ft.), S. of the Indus, at the angle where it turns southwards, the western terminal pillar of the N. or central chain of the true H. W. of the gorge of the Sutlej the Bára Láchá Pass (16,500 ft.) and the Parang-la Pass (18,500 ft.) lead from the British dist. of Kangra (the former N. from Lahul, the latter E. from Spiti) across the N. chain into Kashmír. E. of that gorge numerous passes lead from British terr. across the same chain into Hundes (Tibet), the most important being the Niti Pass (16,650 ft.), on the best and easiest route from Brit. India to Eastern Turkistan, that from Almora passing by the base of the Nanda Devi Peak (25,660 ft.), and then across the pass and by way of Gartokh and Rudokh to Kiria. One of the easiest entrances into Tibet is by the Karnáli (Sarda) valley, in the W. of Nepál, and then across the Lipu Lek Pass (about 16,500 ft.) at its head. Further E. the No-la Pass (16,600 ft.), in about 84½° E., leads into Tibet from Khatmandu. In the Nepálese section of the S. chain are situated some of the highest peaks of the system, including the highest of all. Among these are, in the order from W. to E., Dhaulágiri (26,826 ft.), Mount Everest (29,002 ft.), Makalu (27,800 ft.), and Kánchanjangá (28,176 ft.), this last on the borders of Nepál and Sikkim. Through Sikkim several passes lead from Darjíling into the Chumbi valley, the most important being the Jeilep-la (about 13,000 ft.), and the Gautin-la and Yak-la (about 14,000 ft.), the two latter seldom interrupted by snow for many days. E. of Sikkim the system is little known, but among the peaks may be mentioned Chamalhari (23,929 ft.) in Tibet, between Sikkim and Bhután. The rainfall at the hill stations and cantonments on the outer slopes of the H. [Darjiling, Ránikhet, Chakráta, Simla, Murree] declines on the whole, as on the plains, from E. to W. (the order in which they are here mentioned), though there are deviations from this rule due to altitude and exposure. At all of them it is very high—at Darjíling (new and higher station) 127 in. for the year, 57 in. for July and August; at Murree 56½ in. for the year, 25 in. for July and August, the last-mentioned amount being about equal to the whole rainfall of year at Greenwich. This heavy rainfall within a limited period gives rise to great floods, often destructive, mud avalanches (see Geog. Jour. ii. p. 292, with the correction on p. 460), landslips [Náini Tál], and other examples of rapid denudation. Every year portions of the Darjíling-Himalayan Rly. are carried away during the rains. Some of the interior valleys, on the other hand, are nearly rainless (mean rainfall for the year at Leh, in Ladákh, 2.7 in.). According to Blandford, the relative humidity in the Sikkim H. is 84 in., in the Nepál valley 72 in., in the lower ranges of the NW. Himálayas, 62 in., in Ladákh, 49 in. Combined with the high temperature (for details see the stations already referred to), the high degree of humidity in the outer slopes necessarily gives rise to a vigorous vegetation, the character of which is briefly indicated in the article India. The forest limit varies in different parts. On Nanga Parbat the forests form a belt at an elevation of from about 7000–12,000 ft. In the higher altitudes an enormous snowfall answers to the heavy rainfalls of lower levels. In consequence of this, avalanches occur on a scale corresponding to the violences of the floods (see Proc. R. G. S., 1891, pp. 404–5). Glaciers are met with here of greater extent than anywhere else in temperate latitudes. The largest, as might be expected, occur in the NW., in the higher latitudes. In one case there is a continuous stretch of ice for 67 m. [Hispar, Baltoro]. According to Hermann von Schlagintweit-Sakünlünski, the mean snow-line from 27½° to 34½° N. is on the S. or Indian side 16,200 ft., on the N. or Tibetan side 18,600 ft., the higher limit in the N. or higher latitude being due to the fact that the southern part of the system arrests most of the precipitation. Local conditions, however (the nature of the slope, the exposure, &c.), greatly affect the position of the snow-line (see Globus, 1877, vol. xxxi, p. 137). In Sikkim, one observer notes that the eastern slopes are all snow-free, whereas the snow-line descends low down in the W., the explanation being that there the mornings are clear and sunny, the afternoons cloudy (Alpine Jour., xv. 1890, p. 119; see also Proc. R. G. S., 1891, p. 409).

Honan ('south of the river'), an inland prov., China, between 31° 30′ and 37° N., 110° and 116° 50′ E.; cap. Kaifung. Its N. part is intersected by the Hwang-ho, but the greater portion of the prov. is watered by the headstreams of the Hwei-ho and its tribs., and in the SW. by affluents of the Han-kiang, all of which rise in the mountainous country in the W. of this prov., where the range of Funiu-shan rises to a considerable height; the E. is flat and low. Soil is generally very fertile on the loess of the low lands and in the river valleys, but much depends on the rainfall, and agriculture is very uncertain without irrigation; the higher lands have a relatively small production. On the rich alluvial soil abundant harvests are obtained, but insufficient for the wants of the people. All the cereals are grown, and cotton forms a staple crop (Richthofen). The prov. abounds in coal and probably iron ore. Area, 55,985 sq. m. P. 22,000,000. See China, table.

Honan-fu, tn., China, in the N. of prov. Honan, 280 m. N. by E. Ichang, on the Lo-ho, about 15 m. S. of the Hwang-ho. The Lo-ho, like the Nile, regularly overflows, and deposits new loess soil every year, conferring remarkable fertility in this dist., probably unsurpassed in its agricultural capacity. Percolated water is always found at a depth of 12 ft., hence a spring is maintained in every field (Richthofen).

Honduras ('deeps'—referring to the deep soundings in the bay even near the coast), republic in Central America (formerly called also Guaymura, Hibueras, Nueva Estremadura), between 13°–17° N., 83°–90° W., half as large as Great Britain, with a coast-line of 403 m. on the N., along the Caribbean Sea, and one of 60 m. on the Pacific (Gulf of Fonseca) on the S. The highlands of H. (with a mean alt. of more than 3000 ft.) form a Sierra Madre (60 m. distant from the Pacific), divided into two sections by a deep interoceanic depression (the Humuya-Goascoran, see America, Central); the W. section beginning at the Guatemala border with Sierras Merendon-Espirito Santo, Grita, Omoa (9800 ft.), to the E. of which lie Sierras Pacaya, Selaque (about 10,000 ft), Opolaca, &c.; the E. section containing Sierras Comayagua, Chile, and others in the W. and SW.; Congrehoy and others in the N. The volcanoes around the Gulf of Fonseca (Sacate Grande 2217 ft., Tigre 2589 ft.) continue the volcanic regions of Guatemala and Salvador. The principal hydrographic systems are: (1) rivs. Ulua–Chamelicon–Santiago–Humuya-Sulaco (including Lake Yogoa), draining the W. and central region (one-third of all H.); (2) rivs. Patuca–Guayambre, draining the NE. to the Caribbean Sea; (3) rivs. Choluteca and Goascoran, draining the SE. to the bay of Fonseca; (4) the N. and S. littoral rivs. (Lean, Mirojoco, Nacaome, &c.); (5) the upper courses of some of the Salvador rivers. Along the Caribbean coast there are lakes in communication with the sea (Lagunas Alvarado, Brus, or Cartine, Caratasca, or Cartago), NW. of which lie the five Bay Islands (q.v.). Sacate Grande, Tigre, and a few others are islands in the bay of Fonseca. The ports and harbours on the (1) Caribbean Sea are Trujillo (the most important on the N.), Puerto Cortés (at the entrance of Lake Alvarado), Puerto Sal, Triunfo de la Cruz, Omoa, Ceiba, Puerto Real (isl. Roatan), Útila; (2) the N. and part of the E. of the bay of Fonseca belong to H. Its best port is Amapala (isl. Tigre). Geology.—Tertiary rocks are deposited in the Humuya-Goascoran depression, on the older formations that constitute the mountainous regions, which, in the N., are Calcareous; so also are the littoral tracts and the islands where there are coraligenous deposits. The islands in the bay of Fonseca are basaltic. H. is the richest of all Central American states in mineral, and specially metallic, products—gold (Olancho, Tegucigalpa, Mirojoco), silver (gold and silver, £600,000 annually in the 18th century; in 1884, £120,000), iron (Agalteca), copper, lead, antimony, opals (Erandique), white marble (Omoa), coal (Sensenti), mineral waters (Nacaome) all occur. Climate.—The N. being under the trade winds is very damp, with almost permanent rains (38 in.), and very hot (mean temp. 78° F.; min. 62°, max. 86°). The Pacific lands are dryer. On the highlands the climate is temperate or even cold; rains are frequent, temp. 55°–68° F. Flora.—All the slopes to the Caribbean Sea and great part of the lowlands are covered with tropical forests (mahogany very abundant, rosewood, brazil, logwood, castilloa, vanilla, sarsaparilla). Large savannahs cover some parts of the littoral and interior, stretching between the forests. Pines (on the Pacific side not lower than 1300 ft.) are characteristic of the temperate zones. Ethnography.—A high civilisation left its monuments in the W. parts of H. (Copan). The Chorti are Maya-Quiche; and the Aztec language was used in the SW. The Lenca, Paya, Jicaques, Toaca, to the NE., speak special dialects. There is a large infusion of Negro blood (Sambos) and of Negro-Caribs (since 1796). The Ladinos form three-fourths of the total population. Some of the best regions are still desert. The lowlands of the Atlantic littoral are very unhealthy. Some districts are exceedingly fertile (the Ulua and Chamelicon valleys, Sula, Olancho; the Sensenti valley at 2800 ft. alt.). The principal agricultural products are tobacco (Santa Rosa: Gracias), sugar, coffee, bananas, Indian corn, indigo, rice. Numerous cattle are reared (Olancho, Yoro). Principal exports, silver, cattle, tropical fruits, cacao, tobacco, coffee, sarsaparilla, gold, wood, indigo, leather. Imports, manufactured products. Exports and imports about four million dollars (1892). Principal commerce with the United States. There are few roads, and these still incomplete. A small part of the interoceanic railway through the central depression, uniting Puerto Cortés to Amapala, is only in operation for 57 m. (along the Sula valley). The N. rivers are very convenient means of access to the interior. H. is divided into thirteen departments. Tegucigalpa is the capital. Under the constitution of 1880 the president is elected for four years, and there is an elected congress (three members). The weights and measures are the old Spanish. The silver dollar = 3s. 4d. H. was discovered by Columbus in 1502, and later on was made, under the name of the Diocese of Comayagua, a part of the viceroyalty of Guatemala, which it remained till 1821. In 1839 H. became independent of the Central American federation. England occupied some H. terrs. until 1850. P. (1791) 95,000; (1887) 332,000; (1889) 400,000, or 9 to the sq. m. See America, Central. [J. B. R.]

Honduras, British, a British colony in Central America, on the E. coast of the peninsula of Yucatan, between 15° 48′ and 18° 29′ N., slightly larger than Wales. Its W. boundary is defined as a line drawn from the rapids of Gracias a Dios on the Sarstoon R. to Garbutts Falls on the riv. Belize, and thence due N. to the Mexican frontier (by the convention of 1859 with Guatemala). The N. half of the colony may be described as a dead flat traversed by sluggish streams, whilst the S. portion, which has been only very imperfectly explored, is diversified with plateaux and hill ranges (Cahoon, or Cohun Ridge, &c.), among which the Cockscomb range rises in Victoria Peak to 3700 ft. The coast-land for a few miles inland is low and swampy, abounding in profuse vegetation, and with numerous lagoons. A line of coral reef extends the whole length of the coast about 10 m. out, forming a natural breakwater; it is studded with islands and bays, the largest of which is Turneffe (q.v.). The prevailing type of formation is tertiary; soil is a varying depth of clayey loam, overtopped with rich black mould. The estimated area of land in cultivation is only 60,000 acres, the chief products being maize, sugar-cane, and bananas. Extensive forests cover the country, abounding in fine timber trees, among which the mahogany, cedar, and pine are pre-eminent. Some fine gold-bearing quartz veins have been discovered in the SW., and indications of other minerals were noticed. Among the wild animals are valuable fur beavers, the ounce, panther, tapir, deer, antelope, peccary, opossum, and raccoon. Turtle abound. The Belize is the only river of importance besides the Hondo and the Sarstoon, which respectively form the N. and S. boundaries. Climate hot and moist, but considered not unhealthy for Europeans. It is not exposed to hurricanes and earthquakes, and visitations of malignant fever or cholera are rare. The possession of this colony was long disputed by the Spaniards, but it yielded to Great Britain in 1783, although hostilities were continued until 1798. From 1862 until 1884 the settlement was administered by a lieutenant-governor subsidiary to Jamaica; at the latter date it was declared a separate Crown colony. In 1870 a legislative council was established, presided over (since 1884) by a governor, assisted by an executive or privy council. Cap. Belize. Revenue about £50,000, steadily increasing; imports about £250,000, chiefly from the mother-country and the United States in nearly equal values; exports over £280,000, the principal being mahogany, logwood, coco-nuts, and bananas. For temp. and rfall., see Belize. Area, 7562 sq. m. P. (1870) 24,700; (1891) 31,500, of whom less than 300 are Europeans.

Hong-kong (for Hiang-kiang, 'Fragrant Streams'), isl., in the China Sea, off the coast of China, from which it is separated by a narrow strait called the Laimun Pass, about a mile in width, E. of the entrance of the Canton R., in 22° 12′ N., 114° 11′ E. It was yielded to Britain by treaty in 1842, and with Kowloon, a small terr. on the mainland opposite, ceded in 1861, forms a Crown colony. Length, E. to W., 9 m.; greatest breadth, 6 m.; average breadth, 3 m.; area, 30 sq. m. The surface is mountainous, rocky, and bare, almost destitute of vegetation; excellent water, however, is abundant. Climate unfavourable to Europeans, from the rapid alternations of heat and cold, and from the circumstance that the chief town, banked in by lofty rocks on the S. from the healthful influence of evening breezes, retains the violent heat of the sun for hours after sunset; and as a consequence, the vapours rising under the sun after rain collect in unhealthy clouds, and hang about the hills uncondensed for days. On the N. coast is the cap. town Victoria, laid out in streets and terraces on the steep declivity of Victoria Peak, with numerous fine public buildings and hongs built of stone, and picturesque dwelling-houses surrounded with gardens. P. (1881) 97,000; (1891) 136,900. The roadstead has a well-protected inner anchorage in 6–7 fathoms ⅛ m. off shore; and the port has six graving docks, including three at Kowloon, the largest of which, 562½ ft. long by 86 broad, has 28½ ft. of water over sill at ordinary spring tides. The commerce at this port is inferior to that of the principal treaty ports in China; but as a British colony on Chinese soil, it is the most important in its political and defensive position, and is the headquarters of the military, naval, and mercantile establishments. It is a free port. Total exports are estimated roughly at £25,000,000, and imports at £20,000,000; nearly half of this trade is with China, and a third with India, mainly in tea, silk, and opium. Regular steam communication is kept up with England, India, Manila, Canton, Macao, Shanghai, and all the northern ports. Shortest sea voyage to London, viâ Suez Canal, 9700 m. Mean temp. (Victoria Peak, 1876 ft.), yr. 67.2° F., Jan. 53.0°, July 77.8°; (port) mean temp., yr. 73.5° F., Jan. 59.6°, July 84.5°; rfall. (12 yrs.), 84.45 in. P. Hottentots (origin of name uncertain, probably nickname given to various H. tribes by the early Dutch colonists), or Koi-koin, peculiar native race of S. Africa, totally different from Bantus and Negroes. In former times the H. occupied the whole of S. Africa S. of the Tropic of Capricorn, but now they only inhabit the desert tracts of Great Namaqua-land (q.v.) and of the Kalahari (q.v.), and are only found in small numbers in Cape Colony. They are divided into three groups: Namaqua (or Nama), Korana, and Griqua. The H. are of small stature, and of yellow colour. Their language is totally different from all other African languages, and is characterised by peculiar clicking-sounds. They are a nomadic race, and even the earliest European travellers report that the restless H. tribes of Cape Colony were accustomed to migrate towards the N. Hunting and cattle-rearing are their principal occupations, agriculture being of subordinate importance. Total number estimated at 100,000. See Schinz: Deutsch-Süd-West-Afrika, 1891; and Schlichter: The Geography of S W. Africa, Scot. Geog. Mag., 1891. [H. G. S.]

Huddersfield (formerly Huthersfield, in Doomsday Oderesfield, from a personal name), parl. bor. (1 member), mun. bor. (since 1868), and co. bor., Eng., Yorkshire, W. Riding, 16½ m. SW. Leeds, on the L. & NW. R. and L. & Y. R., and connected with other railways. H. is a modern town. It is not even mentioned by Camden (1607) ; but before the close of the 18th century it had become a seat of the manufacture of undressed woollens. Its 'cloth-hall,' a circular building, 880 yds. in circumference, was built in 1765. Now it may be considered head of the fancy woollen trade, including mixed fabrics of worsted, silk, and cotton, and produces also broadcloths, doeskins, worsted-coatings, and trouserings, &c. There are coal-mines and stone-quarries. Two parks, Greenhead and Beaumont, belong to the corporation. Among its educational institutions is a technical school. The H. Canal (length 23½ m.) communicates with the Rochdale Canal between Halifax and Dewsbury, and at Manchester with the Bridgewater portion of the Manchester Ship Canal. Columbia, on the l. bk. of the Hudson R. at the head of its ship navigation, built on Prospect Hill, a bold promontory overlooking the river, 108 m. N. New York. It has large iron-foundries, knitting-mills, breweries, &c. Founded in 1783, chartered in 1785, the third chartered city in the state in point of time; long noted as a whaling-port. Numerous steamers ply to New York. P. (1880) 8700; (1890) 10,000.

Hudson, riv., U.S., New York, rising in the Adirondack Mts., flowing 300 m. in a S. direction into New York Bay, where its estuary, called locally North River, forms part of the harbour of New York. It is navigable for ships of the first class to Hudson, 117 m., and for smaller steamers to Troy, at the head of the tide water, 151 m.; some 50 m. higher up Glens Falls, 50 ft. in height, effectually stops all navigation. In many places the scenery is exceedingly picturesque, and many flourishing cities are located on its banks. By the Erie Canal the river is connected with Lake Erie, by the Champlain Canal with Lake Champlain, and by the Delaware and Hudson Canal with the Delaware R. Chief tribs. the Mohawk and Sacondaga. Upon this river in 1807 the first successful attempt was made in America to propel vessels by steam. Named after Henry Hudson, the English navigator, who first sailed up it in 1609. Hudson Bay (properly Sea), an inland sea of N. America, between 51° and 64° N., 78° and 95° W., enclosed by the Brit. terr. on all sides except the NE., where it communicates with the Atlantic Ocean by Hudson Strait, and with the Arctic Ocean by Fox Channel. Length, N. to S., 850 m.; greatest breadth, 600 m. It receives numerous rivers, the most important of which are the Churchill, Nelson, and Severn, all on its SW. shore. Its S. part is named James' Bay, and receives the Albany, Moose, and other rivers. Hudson Bay has bold shores, but is reported to be remarkably free from rocks and shoals, and has an average and almost uniform depth of 70 fathoms; but it is free from ice and navigable only for a few months annually. A chain of small islands occur throughout its length on the E. side. Storms and fogs are rare, icebergs are never seen. The climate of the shores during the summer months is mild and genial, but the winters are very severe. Salmon, seal, whale, and walrus are abundant; the coast regions are rich in minerals. It was discovered by Henry Hudson in 1610, who wintered in James' Bay, and was in the following year cast adrift and abandoned by his mutinous crew. Area, 500,000 sq. m.

Hudson Bay Territories, a name formerly given to the NW. Terrs. of the present Canadian Dominion.

Hudson Strait, Brit. America, connects H. Bay with the Atlantic Ocean; about 450 m. in length, NE.–SW., with a breadth of 60–120 m. It is completely frozen in winter, and more or less encumbered during the summer with ice brought in by the cold Arctic currents, that it is only navigable with steam-power from the middle of July until October. First navigated by Henry Hudson in 1610.

Huelva, prov. of Spain, detached (1833) from Andalucia at its W. extremity, having a somewhat triangular form with a base along the Atlantic (Gulf of Cadiz). The Sierra Morena and its spurs (Sierras Aroche, Aracena, Andevalo, Pelada) cover the N. and centre. The NW. and W. are drained by affluents of riv. Guadiana, the NE. and E. by affluents of riv. Guadalquivir, the centre by rivs. Lepe, Odiel, and Tinto, the latter meeting (riv. de Huelva y Palos) on marshy plains stretching SE. to the mouth of riv. Guadalquivir (arenas gordas, marismas). Some of the N. mountains are well wooded (chestnuts, oaks). Those in the centre are naked and sterile. The great characteristic feature of H. is the extensive deposits of iron and copper pyrites (Rio Tinto, Tharsis, Valverde, Coronada), extending W. into Portugal (São Domingos). Some very strong mineral waters (Fuente Tintilla, San Lucar). Some regions are very fertile (wines, fruits). Important fisheries (isls. Christina, Higuereta). Shipbuilding (Ayamonte, Huelva, Cartaya). Columbus sailed from the prov. of H. (Palos) on his first voyage to the W. Indies (1492). See Spain, table, &c.

Húgli (corruption of Hoghá, a species of bulrush common in the Sundarban), tn., Brit. India, Bengal, cap. dist. H., on the r. bk. of the riv. Húglí, 25 m. N. Calcutta. Said to have been founded in 1537 by the Portuguese, who were driven out about one century later by the Mohammedans. H. with Chinsurah, P. (1891) 33,100; Hindus, 26,900; Moham. 5900.

Húgli River, the most westerly and commercially the most important of the mouths of the Ganges, formed by the confluence of three divergent streams from the main channel of the Ganges, known as the Nadiyá Rivs., viz., the Bhágirathí, the Jalangí, and the Churní branch of the Matábhángá, 50 m. above Calcutta. During the dry season these dwindle to shallow threads and pools of water, and contribute scarcely any water to the H., which is then charged mainly by infiltration through the light porous soil on both sides; but in the rainy season they pour down immense volumes of water, which serve to scour the trough of the H., and thus prevent it becoming blocked with silt. 'Training' operations, however, take place annually, with the object of maintaining in them a sufficient flow at all times to keep the channels open. At a few miles below Calcutta the river widens considerably, and receives on its r. bk. the Dámodar and the Rúpnáyárán, at no great distance from each other, shortly after which it becomes a broad estuary, 5–10 m. in width. The arrest of the current due to the influx of these tribs. causes the deposit of sediment, and has formed the James and Mary Sands, which constitute the chief danger of the navigation of the H., and are remarkable for the appalling suddenness with which destruction has sometimes overtaken vessels that have struck on them. During the monsoon the bore often runs at the rate of 22 m. per hour. Ships drawing 26 ft. ascend as far as the port of Calcutta.

Hugri, Hagri, or Vedávati, riv., southern India, rises in Mysore state, flows 125 m. NE. then N. into the Tungabhadra, which it enters in 76° 58′ E. Shallow and rarely navigable.

Hull, riv., Eng., Yorkshire, E. Riding, rising in the S. of the Buckrose div., and flowing S. through the Holderness div. into the Humber at Hull.

Hull, or Kingston-upon-Hull, parl., mun., and co. bor., Eng., Yorkshire, E. Riding, on the riv. Hull, at its confluence with the Humber, in the diocese of York, 174½ m. from London by the G. N. R., and with stns. also on the NE. R. and Hull and Barnsley Rly. The town first grew into importance through its import of fish from Iceland, a trade which had already made it a wealthy town before the close of the 15th century. It now ranks third among the ports of the United Kingdom. The docks are numerous, the Alexandra (46 ac.) having a depth over sill at high water ordinary spring tides of 34 ft., at ordinary neap tides 28 ft. Among the institutions of H. are the Royal Infirmary, Victoria Hospital for sick children, grammar school (founded 1486), Hymers college, several almshouses, including those connected with Trinity House, the Charterhouse Hospital, founded by Lord Chancellor Suffolk (Michael de la Pole) in 1384, and a number of others now merged in one organisation erected by the Charity Trustees. The trade in fish is still large, but is far outstript by other branches. Its leading imports are all those of the United Kingdom; its chief exports cotton and woollen yarns and tissues, coal, oil, machinery and mill-work. There are large cotton, flax, and oil mills, shipbuilding yards, and other industries. For statistics, see Appendix, p. 13. There were in early times two distinct towns or villages on the site of the modern town, Myton and Wyke or Wik, the latter and larger of which was purchased from the Abbot of Meaux by Edward I., who granted it a charter and constituted it a free borough in 1299. For parl. purposes divided into three divs. (East, P. 55,500; Central, P. 65,600; and West, P. 78,900), each returning one member. Mun. and co. bor. P. Humber, The (Abus of Ptolemy), an estuary of the E. ct. of Eng., between Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, formed by the junction of the Ouse and Trent Rivs., 8 m. E. Goole, whence it proceeds for about 18 m. E. and then for about 20 m. SE. to its junction with the North Sea, below the Spurn Head, at its mouth, in 53° 35′ N., 0° 10′ E. General breadth between 1½ and 3 m., but near its mouth it widens to 6 or 7 m. It receives from the N. the Foulness and Hull, and from the S. the Ancholme and Ludd Rivs. It is navigable to Hull for the largest ships, and for vessels of considerable burden in all the rest of its extent, and it is connected by canals with all the principal rivers of Eng. Its tribs. drain nearly the whole of Yorkshire, Notts, Leicestershire, with parts of Lincolnshire; in all, an extent of nearly 10,000 sq. m., or about one-sixth of Eng. Both ancient and modern names are conjectured by Camden to be corruptions of the Celtic aber, 'mouth,' or 'confluence.'

The principal mountains of H. are the Carpathians (q.v.), spurs of which form extensive ramifications in the N. and in the SE. The northern region is mainly inhabited by Slovaks, and the south-eastern, forming the terr. (once gd.-duchy) of Transylvania, mainly by Roumanians. Between these two regions and the Alps in the W. spread the wide plains occupied by the Hungarians proper, or Magyars. These plains are divided by the western offshoots of the Inner Carpathians and the eastern offshoots of the Alps [Bakony Forest (2340 ft.), Vértes and Gerecse Mts. (2070 ft.), and Pilis Mts. (2480 ft.)] into two parts, the smaller being the Upper Hungarian Plain, on both sides of the Danube, between Pressburg and Gran, and the larger the great Hungarian Lowland, a tract of oval shape, of about 37,000 sq. m. in extent, or three-fourths of the area of England, surrounded by the Carpathians and Alps. About altitudes, see Danube. Fertile districts, interrupted by grass land, morasses, and sandy tracts of land (one of these tracts, in the S., a desert measuring about 40 by 10 m.), form the characteristic features of this region. H. is watered by more than 600 rivers, all of which flow to the Danube (q.v.), with the exception of the Poprád (trib. of the Vistula). The Danube, the Theiss (Tisza), and the Maros are the most important rivers of H., and enclose between them the lowest part of the great Hungarian plain, distinguished in Hungarian by the name of Alföld ('the plain'), the region of the true pusztas (from Slavonic pusty, 'uninhabited'). Numerous canals, partly to prevent inundation and partly to promote navigation, connect the Danube and its tribs., the most important being the Franzens Canal (between Danube and Theiss), the Bega Canal (E. of Theiss), the Sárvitz Canal (W. of Danube, between Stühlweissenburg and Szekszárd), the Albrecht Canal (Baranya), the Kapos or Zichy Canal (Tolna). H. has but a few lakes, which are the last remnants of a sea which in former times covered the whole of the Hungarian plains; Lake Balaton (270 sq. m.), Lake of Neusiedl (127 sq. m.). About the characteristic mountain lakes of the High Tatra, see Carpathians. Extensive morasses are the Hanság (145 sq. m.), in connection with the Lake of Neusiedl, the Ecseder morass (near Szatmár), the Sárrét morass (near the Berretyo R.), and various others. Many of the former swamps in the vicinity of the Theiss and Danube have been artificially drained. The climate of H. is on the whole healthy, but varies greatly in different parts of the country. In many parts of the plain it is mild, but in the mountain regions it is raw and inclement [Austria-Hungary]. Agriculture now forms the principal occupation of the people. Wheat yields the largest crop, then follow maize, oats, barley, and rye. The cultivation of potatoes and tobacco is likewise of great importance. The wines of H. are excellent, those of Gran, Tokay, and those produced on the hills W. of the Danube belonging to the best wines of Europe. Pastoral pursuits (horse and sheep breeding, cattle and swine rearing), the original occupation of the once nomadic Magyars, still are a very important factor in the life of the true Magyar of the Alföld, where the Pusztas form excellent pastures. The mineral production is of great importance, H. possessing almost inexhaustible treasures of salt, iron, coal, lignite, gold, silver, and copper. Salt is produced at Rónaszék, Sugatag, and Slatina, in the Upper Theiss dists.; coal in the Banat, at Steierdorf, Reschitza, Bersaska, Drenkowa, and W. of the Danube at Fünfkirchen, and in Transylvania near Kronstadt. Iron is found near Dognácska, Moravica, Szekul, Doman-Nadrág, Reschitza, and Steierdorf. Lignite is obtained in the Bakony near Ajka, at Brennberg near Ödenburg, and in the dists. of Gran and Ofen (Annathal). Gold is produced in Transylvania (at Abrudbánya, Vöröspatak, Almás, Offenbánya) and in the so-called Hungarian Ore Mts. near Schemnitz and Kremnitz, and as wash-gold in the rivs. Maros, Aranyos, and Szamos. The principal silver-mines are at Schmöllnitz and Oravicza. Copper is found at various places (Margitfalva, Szepes-Igló, Schmöllnitz, Libethen, Nagybánya). Lead occurs in the dists. round Schemnitz; nickel and cobalt at

Dobschau and Libethen; antimony and mercury at Rosenau, Magurka, and Schmöllnitz. Precious stones are found in many localities, the most important being the opals at Vörösvágás and Nagy Mihäli. Saltpetre, soda, and potash deposits are met with in various parts of the great plain, especially in the dists. between the Theiss and Berettyó Rivs., and Klein Kumanien. Alum is obtained near Nuczaly, and peat in the Hanság morass. The industrial development of H. is still in its infancy, and unable to supply the demands of the country. Iron and steel works have to be mentioned first, Budapest, Krompach, Rhonitz, Steierdorf, and Dios-Györ being the centres of this branch of industry. Other industrial products of importance are machinery, pottery, glass, flour, spirits, chemicals, and tobacco. Commerce considerable; chief commercial centres Budapest, Arad, Debreczen, Kaschau, Raab, Temesvar, Klausenburg, Kronstadt, Hermannstadt, Sissek, Essek. Principal exports cereals, flour, wool, pigs, timber, wine, spirits; principal imports textiles, hardware, leather, and fancy goods. H. has 2500 m. of navigable rivers, and its railway net is rapidly extending. Inhabitants.—The principal race are the Magyars of Turanian origin, who conquered H. at the end of the 9th century of the Christian era. They inhabit the central parts of the country, and are also found in considerable numbers under the name of Szekler in the part of Transylvania stretching SE. from Maros Vasarhely to the frontier. Next in importance follow the Germans, who are, however, politically insignificant, because they are dissipated in small numbers over the whole of the country. 'The Magyars founded the state, the Germans built the cities,' hence the large number of names of Hungarian towns and villages beginning with the prefix Deutsch (in Hungarian Nemet) and in Transylvania with that of Szasz (Saxon). Then follow Roumanians, Croato-Servians, Slovaks, Ruthenians, Albanians, Greeks, and Jews. The majority of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics; the Ruthenians and Roumanians belong to the Greek Church. In the time of the Roman Empire H. formed the province of Pannonia. A.D. 890–898 it was conquered by the Magyars. Under Stephen the Saint (997–1038) the Christian faith was adopted by the Magyars, and Transylvania was conquered. Robert (1308–42) introduced occidental civilisation, and his son Louis the Great (1342–82) firmly established the interior and exterior authority of the Hungarian crown. In 1526, after the battle of Mohacs, the Turks conquered the whole of the country, and held the central parts of H. till 1686. In the peace of Karlowitz (1699) the Turks made over the whole of H., with the exception of the Banat, to the House of Habsburg, and in 1739 the present boundaries of H. were established. In 1848–1849 the Magyars made a futile attempt to depose the House of Habsburg and to establish an independent Hungarian state (Kossuth 'Gubernator' of H.), but owing to the interference of Russia the Hungarian armies were defeated, and the constitution of H. was abolished. In 1867, however, the constitution of 1848 was again recognised by Austria, and since that time Austria-Hungary has formed two independent states, each having a separate constitution and administration, but both united by common political interests and by the person of the sovereign. Huntingdon, mun. bor. (since 1189) and market-tn., Eng., Huntingdonshire, on the Ouse, 17 m. S. by E. Peterborough, in the diocese of Ely, with two stns., H. on the M. R., and H. (St. Ives) on the G. N. R.; with iron-foundry, two extensive breweries, large carriage manufactory, extensive nurseries, and works for the manufacture of perforated bricks. At its grammar school, founded in 1260, Oliver Cromwell (born in H.) was educated; it is attached to the hospital founded by David, Earl of H., in the reign of Henry II. King Stephen gave this town as an earldom to Queen Matilda's brother (afterwards David I. of Scotland), who rebuilt the castle on the site of Edward the Elder's. H. was called by the Saxons Huntantun and Huntedune, or Huntersdune, apparently because it stood on a tract of land well suited to the chase. Market-day, S. Mun. bor. P. Total . . .	234,218[1]	57,761[1]

[1] The administrative county excludes part of Peterborough urban sanitary dist., in the administrative county of Soke of Peterborough. Area, 233,928. P. 54,969.

Surface (all under 500 ft. in alt.) in the W., S., and central parts gently varied; in the E. and NE. flat, forming part of the great level of the Fens. With the exception of a small area in the NE. (which belongs to the fenland, and is alluvial), the whole county belongs to the Oolite rocks. Chief rivers the Ouse and Nen, which both enter the Wash; the former traverses the county from SW. to E., the latter forms its N. boundary. H. has extensive grazing lands, and its meadows feed many fat cattle. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7-9. There are no minerals of great economic importance. Manufactures are few (the working population being chiefly engaged in husbandry): they include brick, paper, and parchment making, brewing, malting, and iron-founding. The G. N. R. traverses the county from S. to N., and is crossed by the St. Ives and H. Rly., a branch of the G. E. R. This county was included in the kingdom of the East Angles, and subsequently annexed to Mercia. Waltheof, son of Siward, who held the lands, having married Judith, niece of William the Conqueror, was by him made Earl of Huntingdon. See England, table.

Hunza, riv. of the Indus basin, whose valley is regarded by Col. Tanner as forming the W. limit of the Himálayas, winds S. from the Hindu Kush Mts. near the Irshad Pass (about 36° 55′ N., 74½° E.) to the Gilghit R., which it joins a few miles below Gilghit. The upper part of its valley is known as Hunza-Kanjut, the lower as Hunza-Nagar (Nagair, or Nagyr), the latter containing the towns and forts of Hunza (on the right or N. bank of the river), and Nagár (on the l. bk. opposite, alt. 8000 ft.), at the N. base of Mount Rakaposhi, formerly caps. of separate states. The whole valley was brought under the control of Brit. India in December 1891.

Hupe (literally, 'north of the lake,' the Tungting), interior prov., China, in lat. 29°–33° 10′ N. It is entirely comprised in the basin of the Yangtse-kiang, which, with its principal trib., the Han-kiang, intersect the prov. from W. to E. The surface is generally low and flat, and on the lower course of the Han-kiang, even below the bed of the river; the W. portion, however, is somewhat mountainous, and the Hwai-shan forms part of its N. boundary. Many lakes occur in the E. part of the prov. Climate temperate and salubrious. Its plains, well watered by numerous streams and irrigation canals, are renowned for their fertility, producing, besides rice and the other cereals, excellent tea, cotton in large quantity, and many fruits. Game is abundant, and cattle and bees are reared in large numbers. Extensive forests exist. The prov. is rich in coal; iron, mercury, tin, &c., are found; and building stone is worked. Cotton spinning and weaving, the manufacture of paper, and various articles in iron, steel, tin and copper, and bamboo are the principal industries. Commerce is very considerable, especially in rice, grain, and other productions of the soil, which are sent chiefly to Peking. Cap. Wuchang, besides which the prov. contains the important towns of Hankow and Hanyang, and the treaty port of Ichang. Area, 71,430 sq. m. P. 30,000,000.

Huron, Lake, one of the five great lakes of N. America, 43°–46° 20′ N., between the U.S. state of Michigan and the Ontario prov. of Canada. Its shape is very irregular; the NE. portion, named Georgian Bay, being almost detached from the main body of the lake by a long narrow peninsula; and on the W. side Saginaw Bay forms a deep indentation of the coast. The Great Manitoulin and several smaller islands extend along all its N. part. It communicates with Lake Michigan on the W. (with which it is practically one sheet of water) by the Strait of Mackinaw, receives the outflow of Lake Superior on the NW. by St. Mary R., and discharges at its S. extremity by the riv. St. Clair to Lake Erie. The water is remarkably sweet and pure. It is subject to violent storms, but navigation is not usually dangerous. There are some fine harbours on the coasts, but no towns of much importance. It has been ascertained that the water at the bottom of Georgian Bay is several degrees colder than the even deeper waters of the rest of the lake. An old river channel, now choked by glacial drift, still exists, connecting Lake Michigan with Saginaw Bay; and formerly H. did not drain, as it now does, into Lake Erie, but its slopes converge to the entrance of Georgian Bay, from whose S. end another choked-up valley leads into Lake Ontario. Along this latter valley it has been proposed to construct a ship-railway connecting the two lakes. See America, North.

Hwang-hai-do, prov., in W. of Korea, comprising the peninsula jutting out into the Yellow Sea.

Hwang-ho, or Yellow River, called by Mongols Karamuren, or Black R.; in Marco Polo Caramoron, large riv., N. China, rises in the Baian-kara-ula Range in Tibet, about 35° N., 95° 30′ E., at an elevation of over 14,000 ft., and, fed by numerous springs, it soon becomes a considerable stream, and passes through two large lakes (Jaring Nor and Oring Nor), which tend to regulate the water supply to the northern plains of China. Below this its course has not been explored for perhaps more than 800 m., but it is believed to flow, through a mountainous region, first SE. and E. and NE., afterwards making a sharp elbow and doubling back nearly W. then N. to 35° 20′ N., 100° E., in which distance it has fallen almost 5000 ft., probably forming many rapids and cataracts. It then flows NE. and waters Kansu Prov., which it crosses, passing the city of Lanchau, emerging on the high plateau of Mongolia, where its course is first N. then E. It again enters China proper in about 40° 25′ N., 111° E., at an altitude of 3300 ft. above the sea, and flowing a little W. of S., divides the provs. of Shensi and Shansi, to 34° 40′ N., where it receives its largest affluent, the Wei-ho, from the W. Bending E. at a right angle it traverses the N. of Honan Prov., and enters upon the great plain, its present ultimate course from this point being NE. through Shantung into the Gulf of Pechili. It has few tributaries of any importance; and its drainage basin is generally narrow. From the very earliest times the course of the Hwang-ho through the great eastern plain has been subject to great changes, owing to the bursting of its banks, caused chiefly by the large amount of læss brought down by the rapid current and deposited, gradually raising its bed above the surrounding country, inundating immense areas, and involving an enormous sacrifice of life and property. The first recorded occurred more than 2200 years B.C., and nine others are stated to have taken place during the last twenty-five centuries; the positions of the mouths of the river resulting therefrom having ranged over an extent of coast-line of some 5° of lat. The most important in recent history was that of 1851-53, when after having for 500 years flowed in a SE. direction from near Kaifung-fu into the Yellow Sea, it burst on its l. bk., and after flooding a large extent of country, eventually cut the new bed for itself, and appropriated the channel of the Tatsing-ho, which it still retains. In September 1887 another deplorable breach occurred, on the r. bk., also near Kaifung-fu, which destroyed many towns and villages in Honan and Nganhwei, but effectual measures were taken to repair the gap, and it does not appear to have caused any permanent change in the river's course. The H. is almost entirely unsuited to navigation; a shallow bar exists within the mouth of the river, but vessels of light draught can ascend with difficulty about 150 m. to Tsiho, the port of Tsinan-fu. Length, 2300 m.; area of basin, 387,150 sq. m. Discharge of water at mouth, 116,000 cubic ft. per second; sediment deposited, 17,520 cubic ft. per annum. As to the earlier changes in the course of the river, see Bulletin Soc. Géog. Paris, May 1862; with regard to that in 1851-53, Jour. R. G. S., 1870, p. 2. Iceland, an isl. belonging to Denmark, in the Atlantic Ocean, 700 m. W. Norway, and about 300 m. E. Greenland, between 63° 24′ and 66° 33′ N., being immediately S. of the Polar Circle, and 13° 30′–24° 30′ W. The N. and W. coasts of the island are deeply indented with numerous deep fjords, which penetrate far inland; and the NW. portion forms a large peninsula, almost isolated. The interior is a vast plateau region about 2000 ft. in height, with a gradual slope northward, composed of volcanic matter, and consists for the most part of sand and lava deserts, often absolutely without grass, affording no possibilities for the existence of human settlements. Two chains of volcanic mountains rise on each side of the Faxa Fjord on the W., and cross the plateau in an easterly direction, upon which extensive glaciers exist, occupying an area of about 5200 sq. m., ranging in height from 2920 to 6400 ft. Numerous peaks rise on the plateau in all parts of the island to over 4000 ft., the highest summits being Oræfa Jökull, 6431 ft., on the SE. coast, Snaefell, 5984 ft., and Hekla, 5105 ft. The coast is fringed by a belt of rich pasture land, which lies along the more level parts and up the river-valleys, but these are not extensive, and comprise only one-fourteenth part of the island. There are many large streams, which flow generally with great rapidity; the longest, Thjorsa, has a SW. course of 120 m. Lakes are numerous. I. contains many active volcanoes, and has for centuries been the scene of the most violent eruptions; of Hekla there have been twenty-one within historic times; the lava fields, which are scored with deep rocky clefts and fissures, cover an area of 4500 sq. m. Solfataras and hot springs are found throughout the whole island, the chief of which is the Great Geyser, whose waters are thrown up to a height of over 100 ft. The climate is very variable, generally raw, cold, and humid; violent storms are frequent, and snow is experienced in the middle of summer; sand-storms are also often troublesome. The Gulf Stream raises the mean temp. during winter to the highest point which it reaches in the Polar basin, viz., 30°–35° F., whilst in summer it prevents it rising above 45°–50°. See Reykjavik. Forests formerly abounded, but the island is now destitute of trees, except a few stunted beeches; and the flora consists only of mosses and a few shrubs. No grain of any kind can be raised, but cabbages, potatoes, and rhubarb are cultivated. Mineral deposits exist, but no attempt has been made to utilise them; and sulphur mines, which it is believed might be rendered productive; coal has also been discovered. The chief riches of the country consists in its luxuriant meadow-land and the abundance of fish and birds. Ponies, cattle, and sheep are reared, in which a trade is carried on with Great Britain. There are no roads in the island. I. was discovered by the Norsemen in the 9th century, and colonisation was commenced in 874. It continued as a republic until 1292, when the union with Norway took place. I. fell into the hands of Denmark in 1389, in whose possession it has since remained. In 1854 trade was made free, and in 1874 the Icelanders obtained a free constitution of their own. The island is divided into three amts, or provs., subdivided into nineteen syssel or parishes. The population, which is exclusively confined to the lowlands, is annually decreasing, and extensive emigration to Manitoba and NW. Canada is taking place. Cap. Reykjavik, which, with Akreyri, are the only villages on the island. Area, 34,850 sq. m. P. (1880) 72,000; (1888) 69,000.

Here commences the gorges of I. and the long series of rapids extending for 100 m. as far as Kweichau-fu; and below the town vessels ascend with difficulty owing to the rocky nature of the river-bed and the velocity of the current. On this account, as well as from the objection of Chinese merchants, very little trade is carried on, and its importance with respect to European commerce is of small account. The vicinity of the town is subject to inundations. Alt. 500 ft. Mean temp. (1880), yr. 63.0° F., Jan. 39.6°, July 80.4°. P. (1878) 33,600.

Idaho, city, U.S., Idaho, cap. of Boise co., 50 m. NE. Boise, the centre of a very important mining region. P. <2000.

Idaho', one of the U.S., in the Rocky Mountain region, nearly as large as Great Britain; cap. Boise; the only town in 1890 with more than 2000 inhabitants. The country is a wedge-shaped tableland, mean elevation 4700 ft., rising from 670 ft. in the W., at the confluence of the Clearwater with the Snake, to 10,000 ft. in the E., at the summit of the Rocky Mts. The surface is greatly diversified. The principal mountains are the Rockies, on the E. frontier, with their NW. continuations, Bitter Root, Cœur d'Alêne, and Cabinet Ranges; in the centre are the Clearwater, Salmon, and Sawtooth; in the SE., Snake River Mts.; in the SW., Owyhee Mts. Tracts of good arable land are interspersed, as the Camas Prairie, S. of the Salmon R.; Palouse Valley, in the NW., noted for grain; Boise and Payette Valleys. The SE. borders on the Yellowstone Park, and partakes of the character of that region. The S. is mainly a great lava desert, 400 m. by 50 m., intersected by deep cañons, though some of the southern tribs. of the Snake have fertile valleys; an alkali desert occupies the SW. The principal rivers are the Snake or Shoshone, which has a course of about 1000 m. in Idaho, and drains about two-thirds of the state; r. bk. tribs., Napati, Wood, Boisé, Salmon, and Clearwater (the only one navigable); l. bk., Owyhee. The Snake is navigable for about 100 m. below the confluence of the Boisé. The Panhandle, as the narrow N. portion of the state is called, is traversed by Clark's Ford, Kootenay, and Spokane, tribs. of the Columbia. There are several lakes, including Bear in the SE., Pend d'Oreille and Kanisha in the NW. Forests cover more than one-sixth of the state. The geological structure is exceedingly complicated. A wide band of volcanic rock curves from S. to NE.; in the SE., rocks belong mainly to the Mesozoic and Kainozoic eras; in the centre, Quaternary deposits predominate; traversed N. and S. by narrow, often alternating, bands of Permo-Carboniferous and Archæan rocks; the latter also occur in the NE. The climate varies with altitude [Boise, Lewiston]. In the S. irrigation is essential to agriculture, about two-thirds of the farms being irrigated. Minerals abound, but are as yet imperfectly developed; silver and gold are the most important; the Rocky Mountain region, Owyhee, and other dists. have rich deposits; as a lead-producing state, Idaho ranks second; more than three-fourths of the lead is obtained in the Shoshone dist.; copper, iron, and coal also occur. The Union Pacific Rly. traverses the SE. and S., and the Northern Pacific Rly. the N., of the state. There are various Indian reservations, including Fort Hall in the S. and Lemhi in the E., both inhabited by the Shoshone and related tribes; the Nez Percés, near the Clearwater; and the Skizoomish Indians, near Cœur d'Alêne Lake. Area, 84,800 sq. m. P. 84,385. See United States, table. [E. J. H.]

Illecillewaet, or Illecillewact, l. bk. trib. of the Columbia, Brit. Columbia, the valley of which is followed by the C. P. R. from Glacier Hotel, near its source, to its mouth.

Ille-et-Vilaine, NW. maritime dep., France, partly bounded on the N. by Mt. St. Michel Bay, and on the W. by deps. Côtes du Nord and Morbihan; divided into six arrs.: Rennes (cap.), Fougères, Montfort-sur-Meu, Redon, Saint-Malo, and Vitré. The surface is generally monotonous, with the exception of the valleys, some of which are pretty, particularly that of the Vilaine. Haute-Forêt (alt. 835 ft.), the highest point in dep., is a height on the border of Morbihan, in the forest of Paimpont, the 23 sq. m. of which are the shrunken remains of the extensive ancient forest of Brocéliande. Another portion of this forest, which was at one time in great part suddenly engulphed by the sea, now, after being reclaimed, forms a moist plain (the Marsh of Dol, area 58 sq. m.), and the most productive part of the dep. The dep. owes its name to the two rivers which meet at Rennes, by the greater of which, the Vilaine, three-fourths of the water of the dep. is drained into the Atlantic. The rivers which enter the channel are the Couesnon, Guioult, Rance, and Frémur. The greater part of the coast belongs to the bay of Mont-Saint-Michel, and up to the port of Vivier is low, and bordered by vast strands alternately bare and covered, and crowned by the imposing rock of Mont-Saint-Michel. W. of that bay, however, the coast forms part of the wild and rocky shore of Brittany. For climate, see Rennes. The principal cereal is wheat (more than one-fifth of the surface, production per acre about equal to the average for France). Buckwheat and barley are also important among cereals. Among other crops, tobacco. It is one of the leading deps. in the production of cider and honey. Minerals consist chiefly of granite (especially in the neighbourhood of Fougères), slate, and the argentiferous galena of Bruz. There is an export trade in the oysters of Cancale. St. Servan and St. Malo are very busy ports. Cæsar found this region occupied by the Redons (Redones). Area, 2699 sq. m. P. 626,900. See France, table.

It is a serrated ridge with four principal peaks, the highest estimated to be about 21,000 ft. above the level of the sea; snow limit, 17,300 ft. It derives its name from being perpetually covered with snow. On its N. side it has glaciers above the height of 16,350 ft. On it also is the Lake of Illimani, 15,950 ft. above the sea.

Illinois, riv., U.S., N. America, formed by the union of Kankakee and Des Plaines Rivs., flows SW. and S. through the centre of the State of I., to which it gives name, and joins the Mississippi 20 m. above Alton. It is continuously navigable to La Salle, above the mouth of the Vermilion, where it is obstructed by rapids, but a canal has been made from this point to Lake Michigan at Chicago, a distance of 96 m. Ascended by Marquette in 1673; in 1682 La Salle navigated the whole course of the river. Length about 500 m.

Illinois (a corruption of an Algonquin word, meaning 'true'), one of the U.S., nearly as large as England, SW. of Lake Michigan, on which it has a coast line of 60 m. The Wabash forms part of its E. and the Ohio its S. frontier, while the W. is formed for 700 m. by the Mississippi. Cap. Springfield; other chief towns, Chicago, Peoria, Quincy, Rockford, Joliet, Bloomfield. The surface is a vast plain, mean elevation less than 500 ft., with a slight slope towards the W., elevation varied by low grassy hills and lines of bluffs bordering the principal rivers. In the S. is a low plateau of great fertility, known as

'Egypt' (specially noted for its fruit and vegetables); the Great Prairie, 200 m. in length, occupies the centre. The principal interior rivers are Des Plaines and Kankakee, which unite to form the Illinois (navigable for 213 m. to La Salle) and its tribs., Fox, Sangamon, Vermilion, Rock, and Kaskakia, besides a vast number of smaller streams. In the NE. are Lake Fox and many other small lakes. Forests cover from 7 to 25 per cent. of the land. As regards geological structure, Permo-Carboniferous rocks cover the greater part, Silurian predominate in the N., and a small tract of Tertiary occurs in the W. Rainfall is abundant; greatest in the S. [Cairo, Chicago]. The soil is a deep rich loam, particularly suited to the growth of cereals. There are large vineyards. Coal is the principal mineral, in the production of which I. ranks next to Pennsylvania; nearly three-fourths of the total is obtained in the Joliet Region, in the NE.; iron and zinc are also worked; lead was formerly mined near Galena; brine springs occur in the S. Excellent building stone is abundant; quarried chiefly in Monroe, Lawrence, and Decatur cos. Lines of railway cross the state in every direction. The magnificently endowed state university, called the Northwestern University, founded in 1851, now has seven departments—the college of the liberal arts, the schools of theology, the schools of medicine, law, pharmacy, and dentistry, and the woman's medical school, the first two situated at Evanston, the most beautiful suburb of Chicago, and the others in the city itself. The region was first visited by the Europeans Marquette and Joliet in 1673. About 1679 La Salle founded a station at Fort St. Louis. The country was first attached to Canada, and afterwards to Louisiana. In 1763 it was ceded to Great Britain, but was conquered by the Virginians in 1778. Area, 56,650 sq. m. P. 3,826,351. Situation and Physical Features.—No part of the world is better marked off by nature as a region by itself than I., exclusive of Burma. It is a region, indeed, full of contrasts in physical features and in climate, and one that has never been, strictly speaking, under one rule; but the features that divide it as a whole from surrounding regions are too clear to be overlooked. On the N. and NE. the country may be said to be absolutely secure against attack. At a very remote period, indeed, some of the earliest inhabitants of I. appear to have entered the country through passes in the NE. Still later, when the country was fully settled, it seems to have been once or twice invaded by other northern passes; but by modern armies against modern means of defence, I. is on these sides almost unapproachable. It is the western frontier of I. that is weakest on the land side. By the passes through these western mountains [Sulaiman Mts.], all the great historical invasions of I. have taken place. Even there, however, the passes are few and by no means easy. Within the mountains a vast plain, composed of recent alluvium, from about 150 to more than 300 m. in width, sweeps round from the delta of the Ganges and Brahmaputra in the E. to that of the Indus in the W. The peninsular portion to the S. of these plains is mainly made up of tablelands, varying in elevation for the most part from about 1500 to 2000 ft. In some places the elevation is below, in others above, these limits. On the W. this tableland advances close up to the sea, and is bounded by the mountains called the Western Ghâts; but on the E. its boundary is generally at a greater distance from the coast, and is more winding. The name of Eastern Ghâts is sometimes used generally for the whole of this boundary, sometimes restricted to its southern portion. The Southern Highlands begin with a hilly and broken region, on the NW. of which the chain of the Aravalli Hills look down on the plains of Rájputána. Of the tableland proper a marked feature is formed by the Vindhya Mts. and their continuation, the Kaimur Mts., which crown the southern edge of the northern and smaller portion of the tableland looking down on the high valleys of the Narbadá (Nerbudda) and the Son. The whole region to the S. of these mountains is properly known as the Deccan, that is, 'the South,' though this name is sometimes restricted to the area between the rivs. Narbadá and Kistna (Krishna). The tableland, however, does not extend all the way to Cape Comorin at the southern extremity of I. It ends in the S. at a well-marked depression known as the Pálghát Gap, little more than 1000 ft. in height, which lies between the Nilgiri Hills (Dodabetta, 8760 ft.) on the N., and the Anamalai Hills on the S. Both of these hills or mountains rise to upwards of 8500 ft. in height, making the gap between them all the more notable a feature in the geography of I. The Anamalai Mts. are continued southwards by the Cardamon Mts., which stretch near the W. ct. to the low rocky promontory of Cape Comorin. The so-called tableland of the Indian peninsula is far from presenting the uniform level surface that the name 'tableland' may seem to imply. It is, in fact, highly diversified. Large areas, especially in the wider parts, are under 1000 ft. in height. The highest plains, situated towards the S., and forming the northern water-parting of the Cauvery basin, attain an elevation of about 3000 ft. In some places the surface is traversed by ranges of hills running in various directions, in others it is studded by bold isolated rocky hills. Geologically, the tableland is much more uniform in its surface features. The greater part of the area S. of the 20th parallel is made up of geologically ancient hard crystalline rocks. Rocks of the same character prevail over the whole of the NE. of the tableland, and to a somewhat less extent on its northern margin, and the hilly region in the extreme NW., including the Aravalli Mts. An even more remarkable geological formation is spread over the W. of the tableland to the N. of the 20th parallel, extending far eastward into the Central Provs., and northward into the state of Gwalior. It reappears also in the peninsulas of Káthiáwár and Cutch. This formation, commonly known as the Deccan Trap, is a vast sheet of basalt geologically recent (of about the age of the Chalk and the London Clay), but of which, nevertheless, only a few traces of the original outlets of the molten matter can be detected. The area of this Deccan trap or basalt is remarkable for the presence of a black soil (regar), formed on its surface by the wearing down of the hard rock. This soil is notable not only for its colour, but also for peculiar properties which render it of great importance in the agriculture of I., and which will be described in the section dealing with that subject. It contrasts strikingly with a brick-red soil known as laterite, abundant farther S., and found elsewhere in I. Rocks belonging to two other groups cover areas of great extent, though not so large as those occupied by either of the first two. These are the rocks of the Vindhyan and the rocks of the Gondwána system, both found in different regions of the tableland, but rarely in contact with one another. In both, sandstones are the prevailing rock. The Gondwána system is important from containing the coal measures of India. One considerable area of those rocks occurs in the NE. of the tableland close to the delta of the Ganges—the area from which most of the coal now produced in I. is derived. A second and larger area of the same rocks lies in the hill country, which sends feeders northwards to the Son and southwards to the Mahánadi. A third lies on both banks of the Godávari, and its tribs. the Pránhíta and Wardhá, where the course of all these rivers is on the whole from NW. to SE. Rivers of the Tableland.—All but a comparatively small area of the tableland is drained eastwards into the Bay of Bengal. S. of the Ganges basin four rivers, the Mahánadi (Mahanuddy), Godávari (Godavery), Kistna or Krishna, and Cauvery, the last three of which take their rise on the eastern slopes of the Western Ghâts, drain five-sixths of the peninsula into the Bay of Bengal. Only two great rivers of the peninsula, the Narbadá (Nerbudda) and the Taptí, flow W. into the Arabian Sea, the basins of both being long and narrow. S. of these two rivers the streams that descend from the Ghâts to the Arabian Sea are only mountain torrents. All the chief rivers of the peninsula on both sides agree in this, that they break through the Ghâts in long and narrow gorges, which in some of them offer a serious hindrance to navigation. Other impediments to navigation, through rocky obstructions, occur in other parts of their course, so that none of them affords a waterway from the sea to the rich inland tracts which in some places lie on their upper waters. The four chief rivers of the E., the Mahánadi, Godávari, Kistna, and Cauvery, have also this in common, that they all form great deltas before entering the sea. The comparatively broad lowland strip at the base of the Eastern Ghâts has everywhere a gentle slope from W. to E., so that the same words, mel and kil, which signify upper and lower, signify also in this part of the country west and east respectively. From the account just given of the physical features, it may be inferred that communication between the tableland and the seaports is not generally easy, and that it is especially difficult on the W. side, where the Ghâts have to be ascended within a short distance, and there is no river navigable across that barrier. Few of the railways already laid in this part of I. follow the valleys of the chief rivers for any great part of their course. Those which have been constructed have been in certain places expensive to build, and are still in places expensive to work. Before their construction, many fertile parts of the interior had very imperfect means of communication with the coast. Most of the lakes in I. have been formed artificially for irrigation or other purposes. There are only four natural lakes of any size, and these all differ greatly from one another. In Kashmir there is the fresh-water lake of Wulúr, an expansion of the riv. Jehlam, between the two ranges of the Himálayas. In Rájputána, on the NW. of the tableland, is the salt lake of Sámbhar. On the eastern lowlands are the two very shallow lakes of Kolár and Chilká, Lake Kolár, a fresh-water lake between the deltas of the Godávari and the Kistna, occupying, at least in part, the site of old villages; Lake Chilká, to the S. of the delta of the Mahánadi, a salt lake, scarcely anywhere exceeding 6 ft. in depth, and not properly a lake at all, but a gulf of the sea cut off from the Bay of Bengal by a low sandy ridge, through which there is only one opening. Lake Pulicat, on the same coast, about midway between the mouths of the Northern Penner and the Pálár, is still less to be called a lake, since it communicates even more freely with the sea, and is subject to the influence of the tides. Many of the most striking contrasts of I. are due to its climate; yet the chief characteristics of the climate are all in a large measure governed by one great fact—the prevalence of the monsoons. In I. the summer monsoon is usually spoken of as the SW., and the winter monsoon as the NE.; but there are few places in I. where these names describe at all accurately the general direction of the wind in summer and winter respectively. The direction becomes modified by the position of the centres of low barometric pressure and by the superficial configuration. In the Ganges basin the summer monsoon blows up the valley, that is, from the SE., towards a centre of low pressure near the head of the plains of the Indus, the winter monsoon, down. During the summer months, nevertheless, the prevalent winds in most places in the country are more or less westerly, and generally also somewhat southerly; during the winter months more or less easterly, and generally also somewhat northerly; and the names SW. and NE. monsoon are so far fitting, that they indicate the region of the ocean from which and to which the monsoon winds blow when they are at their height, and this is the important fact in virtue of which they have so much influence on the Indian climate. At the height of the summer monsoon, the winds that reach the greater part of I. have their origin over or near the equator, far in the SW.; when the winter monsoon is fully established, the winds blow away from I., as a whole, as NE. winds towards the equator. The place of origin of the summer monsoon accounts for the large quantities of rain which they bring to certain parts of I. The winds blowing from the equatorial parts of the ocean are all heavily charged with moisture; and when these winds are forced to ascend by the form of the land surface, they rapidly become cooled and let fall their moisture in deluges of rain. It should be noticed, however, that the winds that reach the NW. of I. do not arise over the equatorial parts of the ocean if they blow more from the W. than the S. A map of the world shows that the position of Africa and Arabia prevents this. Now the fact is, that the prevailing winds are not more southerly than westerly. Even at Bombay the dominant winds are to the S. of W. only when the summer monsoon is at its strongest, from June to August. Such are the main facts which account for the varied climates of different parts of I. The Indian year is usually said to be divided into three seasons—the hot, the rainy, and the cool;

but these names are appropriate only in certain parts, particularly in the NE. and along the western coast. The hot season is from March to May inclusive, the period that embraces the change of the monsoons from NE. to SW., but before the 'bursting' of the SW. monsoon—that is, before the southerly winds begin to be accompanied by rain. During this period the highest temperature is in the heart of the Deccan. The rainy season lasts from June to October inclusive, and during this period the western slopes of the Western Ghâts, the hills of Assam, and in the E. of the Himálayas, and even the plains of the Ganges delta, are deluged with rain, and the greater part of the NE. receives a fairly abundant rainfall. At Cherra Punji, on the Khási Hills, the annual rainfall is sometimes between 500 and 600 inches, or more than twelve times the average of the whole of I. (42 in.). In southern Madras, E. of the Ghâts, a large part of the rains are brought by the NE. monsoon, and the rainy season lasts from August or September to November [Madras, Coimbatore, Trichinopoli, Madura]. The part of the Deccan immediately behind the Western Ghâts has a very moderate and precarious rainfall, and so too have the plains in the NW. A large part of the Indus region is almost rainless. Where the rains are abundant the temperature is mitigated, but in the arid region just referred to this is naturally the hottest part of the year. At most of the stations between the Sulâiman Mts. and the Ganges, June is the hottest month of the year. The cool season, or the season of the NE. monsoon, lasts from November to February inclusive, and this is the rainy season for the south-eastern plains; but the amount of rain that then falls is only one-third or one-fourth of that which falls on the best-watered plains during the SW. monsoon, and in the NW., even on the plains, there are genuine winter temperatures by comparison with the extreme heat of summer. In this region, in the latter halt of the cool season (January to about March), there is a recurrence of rains. These rains seem to be due to a slow evaporation from the plains themselves. At the season when they occur, the air in that region, owing to the protection of the Himálayas against winds from the N., is so still that the vapour is allowed gradually to diffuse itself to a high level, until from some cause it becomes condensed as rain. These rains are not great in amount, but are nevertheless of high importance for the winter crops of the area over which they prevail. The distribution of the Indian rainfall, together with the causes that give rise to it, has several important consequences. It explains the small number of the rivers in the W. of the great Indian plain, in the basin of the Indus, and their immense multitude in the E. of the plain, the basin of the Ganges and the Brahmaputra. It causes an alteration of high and low water in the rivers. It leads to striking differences in the aspect of the vegetation. Nowhere is this more observed than in the S. of the peninsula, where an arid region to the E. of the Ghâts lies close beside a profusely watered area on their western slopes. Here we behold on the W. ct. an 'endless panorama of beautiful scenery; a surf-beaten shore-line, sometimes bold with dark rocks, or bright-red laterite cliffs; sometimes lightened with a brilliant streak of shining yellow sand, but always backed up by the luxuriant foliage of endless groves of coco-nut, palm, and evergreen bush, completely concealing the narrow belt of lowlands to the very foot of the Ghâts, which raise their dark cliffs and lofty summits at a few miles' distance inland, their skirts and valleys clothed with primeval forest.' But, 'on passing the end of the Ghâts at Cape Comorin, the change is as sudden as it is remarkable. Universal verdure gives place to bare red soil and sandy wastes, and the moist teeming land of the W. ct. is suddenly changed for the parched sunburnt tracts E. of the Ghâts.' It renders irrigation necessary for cultivation in some parts and not in others; irrigation being required not merely where the rainfall is regularly too scanty for tillage, but also where in one year it may be ample, in another wholly inadequate. It is this area of uncertain rainfall that is liable to be visited by famines. Even where the amount of the rain is sufficient for the requirements of the crops, irrigation is in many cases demanded by the mode in which the rain falls. The NE. monsoon, on which the southern plains (Madras) chiefly depend for rain, is remarkable for the fact that rain falls for the most part in bursts, and generally at night. 'I have known,' says Sir Arthur Cotton, 'a fall of ten inches in one night, and a fortnight after twelve in another'—half a year's supply in two showers. The modes of providing for irrigation are various. Throughout a large part of I., water for the purpose is stored in tanks or artificial reservoirs. Thousands of tanks are dotted over the country in Madras, Bombay, and part of the Ganges valley. These, however, contain for the most part little if any more than one year's supply, and hence are inadequate to meet the uncertainties arising from recurring years of drought. In some places larger tanks are constructed, these being mostly situated near the headwaters of rivers flowing across the hard crystalline rocks (see above, under Geology of the tableland), the hollows in which are well adapted to form their beds. In such situations large artificial lakes can sometimes be made at comparatively small expense by throwing a dam across the river valley to collect the water above it [Debar, Ekrúk, Cumbum]. Some similar tanks have been formed also in the region of the Deccan Trap, but there irrigation is less necessary than in many other parts of I. on account of the physical properties of its characteristic black soil (regar). The quality which gives peculiar value to this soil in the region where it most abounds is its remarkable tenacity of moisture. Instead of allowing the rain to sink away to great depths, the soil becomes during the rains a tenacious mud. In dry weather the whole surface of the ground where it occurs becomes seamed with inter-ramifying cracks, between which the soil forms hard lumps, which still, however, retain water imprisoned in their spongy cells. Hence, dry as the climate is, and notwithstanding the rapidity with which evaporation takes place on the surface, wherever this soil exists irrigation is not required. In certain places there is a natural storage of water underground that can always be made available by means of moderately deep wells. The rain sinks into porous soil at the surface, but is retained by a stiffer stratum at no great depth. The whole of the plain along the base of the Himálayas has constant supplies of fresh water underground, and the middle portion of it has these supplies near enough to the surface to be easily reached, while not having a copious enough rainfall to enable it to dispense with irrigation. 'Hence, between Delhi and Benares, the upper stratum of the alluvial plain is riddled like a sieve with water-holes or wells 10 to 50 ft. in depth' (Statistical Atlas of India). Many of the irrigation works of I., and among these the greatest of all, are canals. In some cases, chiefly in the North-West Provs. and Oudh and in the Punjab, these canals are fed by mountain springs and the melting of Himálayan snows. For the most part, however, they are fed from rivers. Some of the canals thus fed are laid so as merely to carry off the surplus waters in time of flood. These are known as inundation canals, and are confined to the NW. of I. (Punjab and Sind), where they were much used even before the British occupation. But works of much greater magnitude have been constructed, mostly under British rule, in the form of perennial canals, into which is led nearly the whole body of water belonging to a river for a greater or less distance, the principal being the Ganges, Jumna, Bári Doáb, Sáran, Son (Soane), and Sirhind canals in northern India, and the deltaic systems of the eastern plains of the peninsula (Orissa, Kistna, Godávarí, and Cauvery). Another important effect of climate combined with other circumstances is to be seen in the distribution of population. Taken collectively, the plains of the Ganges basin, exclusive of the Brahmaputra valley in Assam, are the most densely peopled region of I., and they include considerable tracts in the delta of the Ganges and North-West Provs., with upwards of 600 to the square mile—a density exceeded by few areas of equal extent in the world. In this region not only the extent of the plains, but the abundance of the rainfall, the facilities for irrigation, and the large number of navigable rivers, have all combined to promote the growth of population. Next in point of density is the angle of the peninsula from the latitude of Madras southwards, where also there are considerable areas of plain with a fairly abundant rainfall and exceptional facilities for irrigation. In the delta of the Cauvery, where the irrigation system is of very old standing, the population is far above the average of the region, exceeding 500 to the square mile. Other smaller areas, with a dense population, are situated on the well-watered parts of the W. coast. The tableland, except such part of it as belongs to the angle just mentioned, has only a moderately dense population—under 200 to the square mile. Finally, the basin of the Indus is the most sparsely peopled portion of India, except in the N., at the base of the Himálayas, where the presence of these mountains favours the deposition of rain, and where, it will be remembered, agriculture is promoted by winter as well as summer rains. Lastly, the character of the seacoasts, both on the E. and W., is due to causes connected with the Indian climate. In this case the effect is due directly to the prevailing winds and sea-currents, whose course is dependent on the winds. On both coasts during the SW. monsoon the currents set strongly northwards. On the W. coast the winds then blow inland, and thus tend to blow the dust and the sands of the coast landward. The silt that has been deposited in the sea is, however, slowly but steadily washed northwards, and the ports are apt to get blocked by the collection of sediment at their entrances. The strength of the wind, at the same time, drives the waves violently on the shore. From these causes there are few of these ports accessible at all seasons. The great majority are only fair-weather ports, which cannot be visited during the prevalence of the SW. monsoon. On the E. coast the effect of the wind is still more adverse to shipping. On this side the SW. monsoon is the dry season of the southern part of the peninsula. The sand and loose soil of the plains and tableland is thus all the more readily blown about by the wind, and large quantities of such matter are carried directly seawards, and make the sea very shallow for a long distance out, especially off that part of the coast which runs nearly N. and S. At Masulipatam, between the mouths of the Kistna and the Godávari, large vessels have to anchor five miles out. The shallowness of the sea has another effect, which is sometimes very disastrous. By checking the advance of the waves, it increases their height, and thus causes a constant surf to beat upon the coast, so that vessels cannot approach, and have to land their goods and passengers by surf-boats and rafts. From all these causes there is not a single safe harbour on the SE. coast of India, nor a river-mouth navigable by vessels of any size. Vegetation.—There can be little doubt that at some remote period the greater part of I. was covered with forests, but the area so occupied has been reduced to make way for cultivation, so that the forests have been left to flourish principally in regions which it is impossible, or scarcely possible, to reclaim, in rugged mountainous or hilly country, or in swamps like the Sandarbans. The terái at the base of the Himálayas, a strip of dense jungle, the haunt of wild beasts, was originally left as a barrier to protect the inhabitants of the plain against inroads of the plundering hill-tribes on the N. This area is being gradually reclaimed in places. The destruction of forests has gone so far in India, that it has had to be checked. Certain forest areas under such control are 'reserved,' and in these no one is allowed to cut timber or take any other forest produce without a license. In I. proper (exclusive of Burma) the area of reserved forests in the provs. under British rule is now about 50,000 sq. m., equal to one-third of the area of Bengal. Some of the native states have followed the example of the British government with respect to forest management. Among the principal trees are the conifers (deodar or Himálayan cedar, toon, &c.) of the Himálayas, especially in the NW.; the sál, sissú (sissoo) teak (abundant in India proper, but exploited chiefly in Burma, where the rivers afford the means of cheap transportation), satinwood and sandalwood, various acacias, &c., besides numerous palms (the coco-nut, the date- or toddy-palm of Bengal, the Palmyra- or toddy-palm of southern I., the Java sago-palm, the areca-palm, &c.). Wild animals abound in India, especially in the jungle. Many of them are very destructive, and among these some are fatal to great numbers of human beings every year; but all the efforts made against these species serve only to keep their numbers down and to limit their ravages. Most of them it seems impossible to extirpate. Tigers and leopards are the chief carnivores. The lion, an inhabitant of desert and arid regions, is now nearly extinct in I. A few of a peculiar variety, nearly maneless, still survive in the more rugged parts of the Káthiáwár Penin. (Gujarát). The elephant is found in forests in all parts of I. except the NW., but confines itself chiefly to the hills, and even to the higher ridges. It is now commonest in the NE. and in the extreme S. of the peninsula. In all places it seemed to be threatened with extinction, and its capture is now reserved solely to the government. Among other mammals are monkeys, jackals, the wild hog (all found throughout I.), the dhole or wild dog, the sámbhar (sambur), and axis or spotted deer, the gaur or so-called bison, gayal, buffalo, nílgái (nylgau), wolves, the striped hyæna, and the wild ass (the principal wild animal of the arid regions). High up in the Himálayas the typical animals are wild sheep, goats, and the yak, all of which are used as pack animals across the passes, and some much valued for their fine soft winter wool or down. Of all the animals of I., serpents, above all the cobra or hooded snake and the Russell snake, are the most destructive to human life, causing the death of thousands every year. Crocodiles occur in the rivers, the gavial and a species of dolphin in the Ganges. The insects include bees, silk-moths, the lac-insect, locusts, and white ants. Agriculture.—India is essentially an agricultural country. At the census of 1881 the number of persons directly supported by agriculture made up more than seven-tenths of the male inhabitants engaged in specific occupations. The crops that may be described as universal in India are millets, chiefly the great millet or jodr (Sorghum vulgare), the spiked millet or bájra (Pennisetum typhoideum), and (especially on the southern part of the tableland) rági, the principal small millet, pulses (above all, gram or chick peas), and oil-seeds, sesame (called in I. til or jinjelli), linseed, castor-oil, mustard, and different kinds of rape. Rice is the characteristic grain-crop of the best-watered plains not only in I., but throughout the monsoon region of Asia. Certain varieties, known as upland or hill rice, thrive on a drier soil, and in I. often ascend to an altitude of 8000 ft.; but these varieties make up only a comparatively small proportion of the rice-culture of any country. Opium cultivation has its chief seats in the valley of the Ganges round Patna and Benares, and in Central I., in the region corresponding to the old kingdom of Málwá. Cotton is mainly grown on the tableland, and above all, in those fertile regions covered with regar, a soil so well adapted to this crop as to be known as the black cotton soil. There is, however, no part of I. with a moderate rainfall in which cotton is not extensively grown. Equally wide is the area over which the cultivation of sugar-cane, indigo, and tobacco is distributed, though even the most extensively grown of these three (sugar-cane) does not occupy altogether one-fifth of the area under cotton. The sugar made from native cane or the sap of palms (almost entirely in the imperfectly refined form of jágari or gúr) is much below what is required for home consumption, so that there is a large import of this commodity (chiefly in the form of refined sugar). Sugar-cane is most largely cultivated in the Ganges basin and the N. of the Punjab. Indigo is most abundantly produced in the northern plains, and in certain districts of Madras. Jute is a product of Bengal; tea, of Assam and the Himálayas (Darjíling, Kumáun in the North-West Provs., the Kangra valley in the Punjab, &c.); coffee, of the eastern, and therefore drier, slopes of the Western Ghát, S. of about lat. 15° N. (Mysore and Madras, where tea also has now been introduced); cinchona, of plantations on the Nílgiri Hills and the Himálayas (Darjíling); pepper of the mountains in the S. Silk may also be mentioned among the agricultural products of India, so far as it is obtained from silk-moths reared on mulberry trees planted (chiefly in Bengal) for the purpose, but a large proportion of Indian raw silk is obtained from 'wild' moths in the hill forests of Assam, western Bengal, and the Central Provs. The great cattle-rearing region of I. is a belt extending from Cutch through eastern Rájputána and the Punjab to Kashmír, a belt in which the rainfall is not so excessive as to wash away all the saline constituents which are found to be so essential to the health of cattle. Cattle are the chief beasts of burden and draught in the greater part of I. The mineral wealth of I. is tolerably abundant, but there are obstacles to its development in the face of foreign (chiefly British) competition. There are some extensive and numerous small coalfields; but the most extensive, in the W. of Bengal and the E. of Central I., lies in a region imperfectly explored and not easily accessible; and most of the Indian coal is able to do only from one-half to two-thirds of the work of imported English coal. Nevertheless, the total production of coal in I. is rapidly increasing. In the period 1880-1891 it increased from 998,000 to 2,329,000 tons. The region that produces the greatest quantity of coal in India is the southern part of Bengal (principal centres, Rániganj, Karharbári, and Jharía) to the W. of the Ganges, on the outskirts of the tableland. Among other important centres are Mákúm in Assam, Umaría in Central I., Warorá in the Central Provs., and Singareni in Haidarábád. Iron ore is widely scattered over the country, and, with the profuse employment of charcoal, the best material for smelting, the natives make iron of excellent quality; but in the districts most accessible to foreign commerce this expensive mode of working has almost been extinguished in consequence of the import of European iron and iron-wares. The principal obstacle to the development in I. of a great iron industry on the European system hitherto has been the difficulty of obtaining good ore, good coal for smelting, and limestone for flux in sufficient proximity to one another. The most persistent attempts at the establishment of such an industry have been made at Barákhar [Bengal, minerals]. Among ores that may some day supply great iron-works are those which crop out on a hill close to the railway from Madras to Calicut, a few miles W. of Salem, N. and E. of the Cauvery, limestone also being found near, though smelting fuel is wanting. Among other Indian minerals of importance are gold (in Mysore, in Madras, and Chutiá Nágpur), copper, salt, and saltpetre. Salt is obtained by evaporation all round the coast, from the Salt Hills in the N. of the Punjab, and from Lake Sámbhar and other lakes or pits in Rájputána, but the production is far below the home demand. Saltpetre is obtained from N. Bengal, petroleum in Burma (q.v.). Manufactures.—Not only in metal-working, but also in various other branches of manufacture, the Indian handicrafts have suffered greatly from European competition and the introduction into I. of European methods of production. Cheap Manchester cottons, and, more recently, the products of the native cotton-factories, have told heavily on the old hand-spinning and weaving. Even the fine muslins of Dacca (Bengal) and Madras, for which I. has long been celebrated, have almost become a thing of the past. Cotton-mills (chiefly for the spinning of yarn) are now to be seen in all parts of I., but the great majority are in the Presidency of Bombay, and more particularly in Bombay I., where nearly two-thirds of the raw cotton made use of in Indian mills is worked up. Silk factories worked by steam have been started at Bombay, and jute factories have long been worked with success in Bengal. The manufacture of leather from native hides and skins by means of native tanning materials is also to be included among the rapidly growing industries of India carried on by European methods on a large scale. In the making of various articles of luxury and art, Indian artisans still excel. Cashmere shawls are still made both in Kashmír and the Punjab (Amritsár, Ludhiána, and elsewhere). Rich figured silks are made in many towns. Indian carpets and rugs are articles of export, and so also are a variety of articles skilfully wrought in ivory, gold and silver, copper and brass. Means of Internal Communication.—The part which rivers play in this respect has already been referred to. The first of the great roads of I. was the Grand Trunk Road, which was constructed for military purposes through the whole length of the great northern plain from the delta of the Ganges to the north-west frontier. It was begun by a Mohammedan emperor in the sixteenth century, but only finished under British rule in the first half of the present century. Numerous other roads have since been laid, most of them metalled with stone obtained by breaking up the kankar, or nodular limestone lumps, which are to be found in most parts of I., except the great deltas, in the river-beds, and on the alluvial plains. The first railway in I. was that from Bombay to Thána, opened in 1853—the first part of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway. In March 1890 the total length of railway in I. had increased to upwards of 16,000 miles. In recent years, the annual addition to the railway mileage has averaged about 1000 miles. The great trunk lines of I. are all on the gauge of 5 ft. 6 ins., which is known as the standard gauge. Railways on this gauge now connect Calcutta with the north-western frontier, and that frontier with Karáchi; Bombay with Allahábád, with Calcutta by way of Nágpur, and with Madras, and Madras with Calicut (by a line through the Pálghát Gap). The chief trunk line still wanting is one to connect Madras with Calcutta. Several minor railways have been constructed on the metre gauge (3 ft. 3⅜ ins.), and there are a few short lines on gauges still narrower. The great bulk of the foreign commerce of I. is carried on by sea; and the rapid growth of this commerce in recent years is shown by the following figures, giving, for the whole of British I., including Burma, in millions sterling, at the average rate of exchange for each year, the average value of the imports and exports of merchandise, including government stores, but excluding coin and bullion, for periods of five years ending 31st March:—

	1871–75.	1876–80.	1881–85.	1886–90.	1891–94.
Imports . .	31.68	33.67	43.40	45.58	47.68
Exports . .	55.66	53.42	67.30	65.83	70.52

In recent years raw cotton, opium, rice, and oil-seeds have formed half the value of the sea-borne exports of British I., including Burma. Among the other leading exports are wheat, jute, hides and skins, indigo, and tea. Cotton manufactures, including yarn, make up nearly half the value of the imports, and among the other leading imports of ordinary merchandise are metals, railway materials, machinery and mill-work, woollen goods, coal, and kerosine (mineral oil). It is a very remarkable feature of the trade of I. that bullion and specie, chiefly in the form of silver, are regularly imported to such an amount, that the value, even after deducting that of the exports under this head, is on an average equal to at least a fifth of that of all other imports. As a whole, the trade of I. is a striking example of the exchange of agricultural produce for manufactured articles and minerals. Among the countries trading with I. the United Kingdom takes the first place. China, which takes most of the opium, ranks second under both heads. In the recent history of Indian commerce, the most noteworthy feature with regard to the commodities has been a steady rise in the quantities of nearly all the leading articles of export and import. The principal exception is in the export of opium. On the other hand, during the last fifteen years or so I. has shown a rapidly rising export of wheat, tea, and oil-seeds, and a less marked rise in other commodities. Two manufactured articles also are rapidly rising in importance among the exports: these are cotton twist and yarns, and leather. The cotton twist and yarns are mainly sent to China (including Hong-kong) and Japan, and the amount of the export to these countries increased year by year from about 8 million lbs. in 1876–77 to above 160 million lbs. in 1890–91, whereas the British exports of these articles to the same countries have not increased at all in recent years. Since 1890–91 there has been a decline in the amount of this export from India to the E., apparently owing to the rise of cotton-spinning in Japan. As regards the distribution of the commerce, the United Kingdom maintained its position in the supply of the imports till the last decade of the 19th century, but its proportion of the total value sank from an average of 78.6 per cent. in 1886–90 to 70.3 per cent. in 1893–94. The most notable decline has been under the head of iron and steel, the total import of which from the United Kingdom sank from 4.45 million cwts. in 1887–88 (the maximum year) to 2.74 in 1893–94, while that from Belgium rose from 0.23 to 1.74. There has been a considerable decline in the importation of British salt. The proportion of Indian exports sent to the United Kingdom has declined considerably since 1870, without doubt in consequence of the Suez Canal promoting direct trade, especially with Mediterranean countries. About four-fifths of the value of the sea-borne imports of merchandise into I., and nearly three-fifths of that of the exports from I., now pass through this canal; or, in other words, almost the entire trade with countries west of the canal now passes by that route. The foreign sea-borne commerce of I. proper (exclusive of Burma) is almost confined to four seaports—Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, and Karáchi (Kurrachee), and more than 80 per cent. of the whole falls to the share of the first two. The external trade of I. by land has a total value of more than four millions of Rs. in either direction, or about nine millions when the imports and exports are combined, but this includes the trade with Kashmír. Nepál has the largest share of this trade, and Nepál and Kashmír are the only two countries with which this branch of trade exceeds one million in value (imports and exports together). Moneys, Weights, and Measures.—The currency of I. is based on a silver standard. The money of account is the rupee, which is divided into 16 annas, or 192 pies (pice), and is a silver coin of 180 grains Troy, gross weight, containing 916⅔ fine grains per 1000, so that the fine weight on issue from the mint is 165 grains. Down to 1873 the value of the rupee was not much under 2s., and rupees were generally converted at the rate of ten to the £, but since that date, in consequence of the fall of the price of silver, the value of the rupee has pretty steadily declined. To avoid the growing inconvenience arising from this decline, the government of I., which has to remit large sums to England at gold values as interest on debt, and to meet other home charges, endeavoured to maintain the value of the rupee by closing the Indian mints to silver, and fixing a lower limit for the sale of treasury bills. Yet in June 1893, before the closing of the mints, the rate of exchange for the rupee was a little under 1s. 3d.; in June 1895 about 1s. 1d. [Appendix, p. 14]. The government has been unable to adhere to the lower limit fixed for its bills. The unit of weight for large quantities is generally called the maund, but the maund differs in different parts of I. At Madras it is nearly 25 lbs., at Bombay 28 lbs. At Calcutta the imperial or Indian maund weighs 82.13 lbs., the factory maund 74.67 lbs. The maund is divided into 40 seers, the seer into 16 chittaks. India is inhabited by numerous races, which have obtained a footing in the country at different periods. People speaking an Aryan language allied to the Sanskrit must have originally entered I. through the western passes. It is their religion, now called the Hindú religion, that has come to prevail over the greater part of I., and the language just named is that in which their sacred books, the four Vedas, are written. The modern Bráhmans and Rájputs, the priestly and the warrior caste, the two castes which are still, as they were in ancient times, the highest in the Hindú religion, are believed to be comparatively pure descendants of these original Aryan settlers. Together they now number in British I. about one-twelfth of the population. They are mostly found in the northern plains, where their first settlements were made. The two other castes of ancient I. (now divided into innumerable minor castes), the Vaisyas, or cultivating caste, and the Sudras, or servile caste, in course of time got mixed with a still earlier population. Others of these original non-Aryan inhabitants took refuge in the mountains and hills. The great majority of these older non-Aryans may be divided into three great groups, Tibeto-Burmans, inhabiting the slopes of the Himálayas, and the mountains in the NE., the Kolarians and Dravidians, inhabiting the southern mountains and tableland. Languages descended from those of the old Aryan and old non-Aryan inhabitants of I. are those which prevail over the country to this day. Aryan languages are those which are spoken not only over the greatest extent of country, but also the most populous regions, and thus by the great majority of the people. Their domain includes all the great plain, together with the northern half of the tableland. They are spoken in seven chief dialects, namely, Bengalí, spoken in the valley of the Lower Ganges and Brahmaputra as well as the valley of the Surma (the southern valley of Assam); Uríyá spoken in the region to the SW. (Orissa and the neighbourhood); Hindí, the most widely spoken of all, its domain comprising the whole of the middle and upper Ganges basin, including all that part of the basin which belongs to the tableland on the S.; Punjabí in the N., and Sindhí in the S. of the Indus basin; Gujaráthí in the NW. of Bombay, including the penins. of Cutch and Kathiáwár; and Maráthí in the region next to the S., extending eastward into the Central Provs. Of these seven, Sindhí is the only one that has no literature. Of the non-Aryan languages, the Dravidian are by far the most important, being spoken over nearly all the S. of the tableland together with the adjoining lowlands. There are four chief dialects of this group; first, the Tamil, spoken by the largest population, its domain being all the densely peopled plains and lowlands, together with part of the tableland from Madras southwards; second, Telugu, spoken in the region to the N. as far as the Godávari; third, Kánarese, spoken in the area to the W. of the previous; and fourth, Malayálam, spoken on the Malabar coast from Coorg southwards. The Tamil is a cultivated language, with an important literature. Besides these four, there are several minor dialects; two of them, the Khond and the Gond, are spoken over considerable areas on the tableland in the E. of the Godávari basin. Among the religions of I., Mohammedanism is mainly due to two series of invasions from the W., the one beginning early in the 11th century of the Christian era, the other with the invasion of the Mughal conqueror Bábar in 1526, and many of the Mohammedans are descended from these invaders. Buddhism at one time prevailed all over I., but gradually died out, or nearly, as in

I. proper, after the 8th or 9th century A.D. Christianity, according to the Syrian rite, gained a footing on the Malabar coast before the end of the 2nd century of the Christian era, and a Christian community, numbered by hundreds of thousands, descended from these early Christians, survives there to this day. The following table shows the distribution:—

Government.—At the present day almost the whole of I., along with Burma in the Eastern Peninsula, is either under direct British rule, or is subject to native princes more or less under British influence. Among European powers, Portugal and France alone retain possessions in I. Since 1858 the government of British I. has been vested in the Crown, which appoints a viceroy or governor-general for the whole country, who is the head of two councils, an executive and a legislative. The executive council is composed of seven members, including the viceroy and the commander-in-chief of the army, the members presiding respectively over the following departments:—finance, home-affairs, revenue and agriculture, foreign affairs, military affairs, public works, and legislation. The legislative council comprises the same members along with twelve other nominated members, some official and some non-official, and the governor of the prov. in which it is held. Bombay, Madras, and Bengal have each a subordinate legislative council, the members of which are appointed by the head of the respective provs. All the provs. of British I. are divided into 'districts,' each under an officer bearing the title of collector-magistrate, or (in some parts) deputy-commissioner. In certain provs. dists. are grouped into 'divisions,' in each of which a 'commissioner' is the head of the administration. The revenue is mainly derived from a land-tax (yielding at least two-fifths of the whole amount); the sale of opium (which is a government monopoly in Bengal); a tax on salt (a government monopoly in Madras); excise duties on spirits, ganja, and other intoxicating preparations made from hemp, &c.; customs (import duties and an export duty on rice), stamps, and provincial rates (mainly levied on land for special local purposes). Education is fostered by the government in British I. in various ways. At the head of the educational system are four universities, at Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Lahore. Only the last of these has a teaching staff, the other three being merely examining bodies with the privilege of conferring degrees. There are many colleges, however, which impart the highest English education, or prepare students for the professions of law, medicine, or engineering. There is likewise a large number of 'public' schools, in which the course of study conforms to the standard prescribed by the department of public instruction or the university, and which are either inspected by the department or send up pupils to the public examinations. The native states are subject to their own rulers, who are, however, bound to allegiance to the British authorities, and have a British official stationed at their court. In the larger states this official is known as the British Resident. Some of the smaller states are grouped together and placed under the supervision of an 'agent for the governor-general.' The Portuguese were the first Europeans to visit I. and acquire influence there, the Portuguese navigator Vasco da Gama having sailed to I. after doubling the Cape of Good Hope. For an entire century Portugal retained command of the entire trade between Europe and I., as well as the rest of eastern Asia. In I. they acquired power in various places, but now the only relics of their rule are the terr. of Goa and the seaports of Daman and Diu, all in Bombay. The Portuguese were followed by Dutch, Danes, French, and English all of whom established trading factories in I. During the 18th century a great struggle took place between the French and the British in I., at the end of which the British came out as the victorious power, and since then British influence in I. has constantly increased. The relics of the French possessions are Pondicherri, Chandarnagar, Karikal, Yanaon, and Mahe. In 1765 the (British) East India Company secured from the Mughal emperor the cession of the populous provs. of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa in the NE. Already, however, the power of the Mughal emperor had been reduced to a mere shadow by the establishment of the great Hindu power of the Maráthás in the S., and the encroachments of the Sikhcon federacy on the NW. The British consolidated and extended their own authority by victories over each of these rivals in turn. Several wars were waged against the Maráthás, and at the close of the last of them, in 1818, large additions were made to British terr., chiefly on the NW. of the tableland. In 1849 the Punjab was annexed by the British after a successful war against the Sikh confederacy in the NW. In 1857 the last Mughal emperor was deposed by the British.

Indiana, bor., U.S., Pennsylvania, cap. I. co., 47 m. E. by N. Pittsburg. I. co. is bounded on the S. by the Kiskiminetas R. P. <2000. West I., adjoining bor., P. <2000.

Indiana, one of the U.S., rather more than half the size of England, N. of the Ohio, with a shore-line of 50 m. on Lake Michigan. Cap. Indianapolis; other chief towns, Evansville, Fort Wayne, Terre Haute, South Bend, New Albany, and La Fayette. Michigan City is the only sea- (lake-) port. The surface is an undulating plain, sloping towards the SW. High sandhills border the lake-shore, and in the Ohio valley are abrupt limestone bills, 400-500 ft., in which is the celebrated Wyandotte Cave. Chief river, Wabash, which, with its tribs., drains three-fourths of the state, and forms the W. frontier for about 100 m.; navigable 300 m., to Logansport; principal trib., l. bk., White R. In the N. are several small lakes; formerly much of this region was covered with swamps and lagoons, but it has now been drained in great part. About one-third of the country is under wood. Permo-carboniferous rocks cover a large area in the S.; Devonian strata form a diagonal central band S. to NW., spreading out widely in the N.; Silurian rocks occur in the extreme NW. and in the E. The climate is in general healthy, but variable; northerly and north-westerly winds prevail during winter [Indianapolis]. Cereals cover about one-third of the state, and yield large crops; the Wabash valley in particular is noted for its rich harvests of maize and wheat. Flax-seed and sorghum are among the other crops. Apples, peaches, and the vine flourish. The minerals include coal, of which the beds cover 6450 sq. m.; building-stone, including the noted Bedford or Indiana limestone, quarried chiefly in the S. and SE., and whetstone. Natural gas, first struck in 1889, is proving an important factor in the development of the state, being used in many towns both for domestic and manufacturing purposes. Manufactures have increased tenfold in thirty years. The principal are woollen goods, vehicles of all sorts, ploughs, rope-transmission appliances, machinery, office desks, plate-glass; pork-packing and the preparation of corn-foods are also extensive industries. The state is crossed by a network of railways; the canal from Toledo to Evansville traverses it for 379 m., and the Whitewater has a length of 70 m. I. was first visited by La Salle's expedition, 1669–70. The S. was subsequently attached to Louisiana, and the N. to Canada. In 1800 it was formed into a terr., which, a few years later, included all the land from Ohio to Oregon co. The name was first applied in 1768 to a tract of land granted by the Indians to traders. Area, 36,350 sq. m. P. 2,192,404. See United States, table. [E. J. H.]

Indianapolis, city, U.S., Indiana, Marion co., at the confluence of Fall Creek and White R., 68 m. ENE. Terre Haute. Now an important railway centre, on which fifteen main-lines converge, all connected by the so-called 'belt-line.' Has large trade in grain and live-stock, and many manufactures. First named in 1821, when it stood in a vast level forest, broken only by Indian trails; first provided with railway communication in 1847. Alt. 753 ft. Mean temp., yr. 53.5° F., Jan. 29.8°, July 77.0°; rfall. (13 yrs.), 47.01 in. Alt. 753 ft. (U.S. Signal Office). P. Indian Ocean, ancient Indicum Mare, one of the five great hydrographical divisions of the globe, N. of the Antarctic Circle, separated from the Pacific on the E. by the Asiatic Archipelago and Australia, continued S. by an imaginary meridian line from the S. point of Tasmania, 146° 55′ E.; divided from the Atlantic by Africa and the meridian of Cape Agulhas, 20° E., on the W.; and enclosed by the countries of S. Asia on the N. In the NE. it communicates with the Pacific Ocean by the channels between the Sunda Is. and by the Timor Sea. NW. by the Red Sea and the Suez Canal communication is established with the Mediterranean. The Bay (or sea) of Bengal and the Arabian Sea form portions of the I. Ocean; but the Red Sea and Persian Gulf, which communicate with the Arabian Sea by narrow straits, are properly considered separate seas. The Gulfs of Aden and Oman in the Arabian Sea, leading respectively to the Red Sea and Persian Gulf, are the only ones of importance. Chief straits, the broad channel of Mozambique and Palk Strait. The islands are Madagascar, Mauritius, Bourbon, the Comoro, the Seychelles, and Socotra belonging to Africa; the Laccadives, Maldives, Ceylon, the Andaman, and Nicobar to Asia; with the islands off the W. ct. of Sumatra, Sumba, Kerguelen, St. Paul, and Crozets. The drainage area of the I. Ocean is more circumscribed than those of the Atlantic and Pacific, consequently its rivers are of less extent and volume; the principal are, in Asia, the Salwín, Iráwadi, Brahmaputra, Ganges, Godávari, Kistna, Narbadá, Indus, and the Shat-el-Arab, formed by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates; in Africa, the Zambezi and Limpopo. The bed is tolerably uniform throughout, shelving steeply to 2000 fathoms at an average distance of about 120 m. from the coast, except in the Bay of Bengal, the Mozambique Channel, and SW. of India, where the greatest depths recorded do not reach 2000 fathoms. The E. side is somewhat the deeper, over 3000 fathoms having been sounded in some places, slanting upwards to the SW., where in the extreme S. the depth does not exceed 1000 fathoms. The most extensive banks are those on which the Comoro, Seychelles, Chagos, and Maldive Is. are situated, and a long patch NE. of Mauritius, extending from 8°–17° S., intersected by 60° E. Indian Territory, country of the U.S., about the size of Ireland, W. of Arkansas, and surrounding the terr. of Oklahoma, occupied by the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole nations, and various small Indian tribes. The surface consists mainly of fertile rolling prairies and rich valleys; in the S. are the San Bois, Shawnee, and Wichita Hills. Principal rivs., Arkansas (navigable at high water to Fort Gibson), r. bk. trib. Canadian R.; Red R. (navigable nearly along the whole S. boundary), and its l. bk. trib. Washita. A belt of forest, chiefly oak, about 40 m. wide, called the Cross Timbers, traverses the terr. N. and S.; other parts are well wooded. Permo-carboniferous rocks predominate in the N., E., and SW.; Cretaceous rocks occur along the Red R. valley; Triassic in the W.; and small deposits of Quaternary and Archæan in the centre and S. The climate is pleasant; winters short, with little snow; summers long and hot [Fort Gibson]. Agriculture, cattle-rearing, and lumbering are the principal occupations. Coal-measures cover an area of 20,000 sq. m., and have an estimated thickness of 8500–10,000 ft. The chief mining centres are M'Allister and Hartshorne in the SW. Railways traverse the E., W., and N. of the terr. Indian Terr. forms part of a much larger region assigned by Act of Congress, 1830, as the domain of Indians transferred thither from eastern states. The Indians have the right of self-government, but the U.S. claims sovereign authority. Each of the five nations is governed by a principal and a second chief elected for two to four years, a legislature of two houses meeting annually, and a judiciary system. An International Council, consisting of representatives from the various tribes, meets occasionally. Education is well advanced, and there are numerous schools conducted by native teachers, while many young Indians are educated in U.S. colleges. The Cherokee nation, originally inhabiting Georgia, occupies the region N. of the Arkansas; cap. Tahlequah; principal business town, Vinita. The Reservation is divided into nine counties. The Creek nation, formerly inhabiting Alabama and Georgia, dwells S. of the Cherokees, between the Arkansas and the N. fork of the Canadian R.; cap. Okmulgee. The Choctaw nation, from S. Alabama and Mississippi, occupies the SE. corner between the Red, Arkansas, and Canadian Rivs.; cap. Atoka. The Chickasaw nation, from Northern Mississippi and Alabama, occupies the country W. of the Choctaws, and bordering on Texas; cap. Tishomingo. The Seminole nation, from Florida, the smallest and best organised of the five, occupies the land between the N. and S. forks of the Canadian R.; cap. Wewoka. In the extreme NE. are various small tribes of Reservation Indians. Area, 31,400 sq. m. P. 186,490. See United States, table.

Indo-China, Eastern Peninsula or Farther India, the peninsula between India and China; now mostly divided between Great Britain, Siam, and France. The British terr. is made up of the former empire of Burma, which, as regards administration, forms part of British India, together with the Straits Settlements and Protectorates in the Malay Penin.; the French, of Cochin-China, Cambodia, Annam, and Tongking. The native state of Johore (S. end Malay Penin.) is in alliance with the British. The N. part of the interior, which is very mountainous, is occupied by Shans, partly belonging to British, and partly to Siamese and French terr., but practically in a large measure independent. By far the greater part of the area is sparsely peopled, the average density of population being generally under 50 to the sq. m., the only considerable area with a greater average density being Tongking, in the deltaic portion of which the population is relatively dense. This paucity of population is in a great measure attributable to the mountainous character of a large part of the country, the existence of numerous extensive swamps in the more level tracts of the interior, and the defectiveness of the communications. Among other causes have been devastating wars, inroad of robber bands from the mountains, and other consequences of the want of strong government. The people are mainly of Mongolic type, speaking monosyllabic languages. The prevailing religion is Buddhism, but Mohammedans are numerous in the Malay Penin.

Indravatí, riv., India. See Bastár.

Indre, dep., France, in the central zone, to the S. of the Cher and the Canal du Berry, formed in 1790 from parts of Berry, Orléanais, Marche, and Touraine; divided into four arrs.: Châteauroux (cap.), Issoudun, Le Blanc, and La Châtre. The surface consists of a vast plain sloping downwards to the WNW., and terminated in the S. by the mountains of Marche, part of the central plateau of France. The culminating point of the dep., Colline de Fragne (alt. 1505 ft.), is in this chain. Physically, the dep. consists of three regions: Le Boischaut, dist. of hills, covering all the N. and S. (three-quarters of the area of the dep.), still abounds in woods (Low Latin boschetum, bosquet, hence name of dist.), heaths, brushwood, marshes, and pools. Le Brenne, occupying more than one-seventh of the dep. in the W., is a dist. so unhealthy, that it has been called Petite Sologne, or Sologne de Berry. Its unhealthiness is caused by the exhalations from its numerous pools, which rest on a basis of impermeable rock. The surface covered by these pools, which are mostly artificial, dating from the 13th century, has been much reduced, and fever has decreased in proportion. La Champagne, to the E. of La Brenne, covers about 12 per cent. of the surface. The dep. is drained by the Cher, Indre, and Vienne into the Loire. The principal cereal is wheat, the average production of which per acre is below the average for France. The vine occupies more than 2 per cent. of the surface, but produce per acre is less than half the average for France. Sugar-beet is grown to a small extent. The chestnuts of the dep. are noted. Minerals consist chiefly of lithographic stones from Châteauroux, and millstones from Lignac and Néret. Among the industries of the dep. are the blast-furnaces of Caillaudière, and the manufactures of cloth at Argenton, Levroux, and particularly Châteauroux. Area, 2666 sq. m. P. 292,900. See France, table.

Indre, riv., France, chiefly in deps. Indre and Indre-et-Loire, joins the Loire 18 m. WSW. Tours, after a NW. course, deep and calm, of 115 m. On it are the towns La Châtre, Châteauroux, Chatillon, and Loches, and many mills. Mean breadth, 100 ft.; not navigable.

Indre-et-Loire, dep., central France, traversed from E. to W. by the Loire, and just S. of the Loir; formed in 1790 from Touraine, a small portion of Anjou, piece of Poitou, and a strip of Orléanais; divided into three arrs.: Tours (cap.), Chinon, and Loches. The surface is a plain, 300–450 ft. in height, furrowed by the valleys of rivers all flowing towards the Loire. N. of this river lies La Gatine, a somewhat poor dist.; to the S. stretches Varennes, the part of the Loire valley between the Loire and Cher. La Champagne, or Champagne, is the plain between the valleys of the Cher and Indre, Le Véron, a fertile dist. between the Loire and the Vienne as far as Chinon. Between the Indre and Vienne the Plateau des Falunières comprises immense falunières, débris of shells, and marine organisms, valuable as fertilisers. Principal cereal wheat (occupying about one-sixth of surface), the relative production of which is less than the average for France. The vine occupies more than 10 per cent. of surface, but the production of wine per acre is less than one-half average for France. Sugar-beet and flax are grown to a small extent. The chief forests are the former royal ones of Chinon, Loches, and Amboise. Meadow-land stretches more particularly S. of Tours and Amboise, bounded by the lower course of the Cher and Loire. Minerals are unimportant, and manufactures little developed. Area, 2377 sq. m. P. 337,300. See France, table.

Indus, the principal riv. of NW. India, rises on the N. of the Kailas Range in Tibet, 18,000 ft. above the sea, in about 31° 30′ N., 81° 20′ E., near the lakes at the head of its principal trib., the Sutlej, and only about 80 m. distant from the sources of the Sanpo. It flows first N. and W. 160 m., through perhaps the wildest parts of the Himálayas, and joins the Gartung-Chu, or 'river of Gartock,' 50 m. below this junction it enters Kashmír, which it crosses in a NW. direction between the Karakoram and Himálaya ranges, through Ladakh in an open valley at a height of 11,000 ft. over a sandy bed with a gentle winding current, past the fruit garden of Skardo, 7700 ft., succeeded by deep and gloomy gorges in the vicinity of Bunji, where it attains its highest lat., 35° 50′ N., 74° 45′ E. From the mountains of Kashmír on the S. it receives the rivers Zanskar and Dras, and at 75° 57′ E. the Shayok on the right, which is its largest trib. above the Kabul. Soon after passing Bunji its direction changes to SSW., which it maintains as far as 32° N., receiving at Attock (1100 ft.) the Kabul R. from Afghanistan. It has now left the mountainous region of the Himálayas; but for 100 m. below Attock to Kalabagh it is an enormous torrent, after which it enters the plains, and flows, with numerous side channels, S. to Mithankot, distant 370 m. Here in lat. 29° is the confluence of the Panjnad, the river that conveys the united waters of the Punjab to the I. It flows now SW. then S., and falls into the Arabian Sea, by many and often-shifting mouths, at 23° 40′ to 24° 45′ N., throwing off the Narra branch at lat. 28°. The delta begins at 25° 30′ N., and has a coast-line of 125 m. From its source to Skardo the I. has an average fall of 24 ft. per mile, thence to Attock 17 ft., to Kalabagh 50 in., to Mithankot 12 in., below which to the sea only 6 in. per mile. At its lowest in winter it is 500 ft. wide at Skardo, and 9 or 10 ft. deep. At Attock, where the bed narrows considerably between rocky banks, its depth is 22 ft. at low water, and the river often rises 50 ft. in flood season above the lowest level at other times, with a velocity of 13 m. per hour; in 1858 the rise was 80 ft., and in 1841 it is believed to have reached no less than 92 ft., when a vast extent of country was inundated, and great loss of life and immense damage was caused. 20 m. below Attock the river has cut a central trough about 180 ft. in depth. At Dera Ghazi Khan its bed, ¼ m. wide in the hot season, is increased to 18 m. during the rains. A large amount of silt (very fine sand and clay) is brought down by the powerful current, a great deal of which is deposited after leaving the hills, and employed in raising the bed of the river where the fall is slight and the flow languid; thus below Sukkur, for nearly 400 m. in the plain of Sind, it flows on an embankment made by itself with a long gentle slope on either side down to the general low level of the country. In this part of its course it is so shallow that it can only be navigated by vessels with a small draught of water, and when swollen, overflows the adjacent country to a great extent, giving rise to subsequent malarial diseases. Its average discharge is computed at 200,000 cubic ft. per second, increased at flood to 380,000 cubic ft., and in exceptional floods to much more. One in the month of August was estimated at 460,000 cubic ft. per second. The solid matter brought down by the I. and its tribs. in three months of flood is said to amount to 6,480,000,000 cubic ft. A steamer service was formerly maintained between the head of the delta and the confluence of the Panjnad, but since the opening of the railway from the northern Punjab to Karáchi has been given up. The gavial, or long-snouted alligator, otters, turtles, porpoises (bálhani) are abundant in the river; fishes and water-serpents occur in great varieties and numbers. Length nearly 2000 m.; area of basin, 360,050 sq. m.

Iowa, one of the U.S., a little smaller than England, bounded on the E. by the Mississippi, and on the W. (mainly) by the Missouri. Cap. Des Moines; other principal towns are Sioux City, Dubuque, Davenport, Burlington, Council Bluffs, and Cedar Rapids. The surface is undulating, highest in NW. (Plateau du Coteau), and sloping to SE. Lines of bluffs border the principal and other rivers, and in the N. low hills with groves of oak and hazel rise above the plain. The principal interior rivers (but of little use for navigation) are Upper Iowa, Turkey, Maquoketa, Wapsipnicon, Cedar, Iowa, and Des Moines, r. bk. tribs. of Mississippi; Big Sioux, Little Sioux, Nishnabola, and other l. bk. tribs. of Missouri. In the NW. are many picturesque lakes. The best wooded dists. are the river bottoms in the E. As regards geological structure, the S. belongs to the great Permo-carboniferous area; Silurian rocks occur in the NE., and between these and the preceding are Devonian formations; Quaternary deposits cover a large area in the NW. The climate is healthy and dry, but the winters are severe [Davenport, Dubuque, Keokuk]. The soil is fertile, less than 1 per cent. being unfit for cultivation; the richest dists. are the valleys of I. and Des Moines; the least fertile are found in the N. More than half the pop. are engaged in farming. Maize (in the production of which the state ranks first) is the leading crop; wheat (grown chiefly in Cedar Valley), oats, and potatoes are extensively cultivated. The blue-grass region of the SW. furnishes large quantities of hay for export. Fruits and vegetables are abundant; the Muscatine dist. is noted for water-melons. Locusts and other insects, notably the chinch bug, have in the past done great damage to crops. Coal-beds underlie nearly one-third of the state; the chief mining regions, Mahaska in the NE., and Des Moines Valley in the SE.; lead and zinc are obtained in small quantity; gypsum is worked near Fort Dodge. Manufactures include agricultural implements and waggons, furniture, woollen goods, boots and shoes; other industries are meat-packing, flour and lumber mills. I. was visited by Marquette and Joliet in 1673, but the first white settler was Dubuque, 1788–1810. The terr. formerly belonged to Louisiana; in 1812 it was attached to Missouri, and later, for short periods, to Michigan and Wisconsin. Area, 56,025 sq. m. P. 1,911,896. See United States, table. Ipswich (corrupted from Gypeswic, 'Gipping bay'), seapt., parl. bor. (2 members), mun. bor. (since the reign of John), and co. bor., Eng., cap. co. Suffolk, Woodbridge div., at the head of the Orwell, at the confluence of the Gipping, 23 m. SE. Bury St. Edmunds, in the diocese of Norwich and deanery of I., on the G. E. R. I. has always been of commercial importance; its manufactures consist of agricultural implements, railway ironwork, and artificial manure from the coprolites found in vicinity, clothes and shoes, &c. The dock (32 acres), opened in 1842, has a depth of 17 ft., but with a lock entrance (opened 1882) 20½ ft. deep at neap tides. The grammar school was founded in 1477, and the almshouses were the gift of Henry Tooley (1550) and William Smart (1598). Cardinal Wolsey was born here (1471), in a house still standing. The gate of the Cardinal Wolsey's college is all that has remained for more than a hundred years of that foundation, the site of which was devoted to other purposes soon after the disgrace of the founder. The arboretum consists of two well laid out pleasure-grounds. Fairs for lean stock, first Tuesday in May; for horses and lambs, August 22. Market-days, Tu. (corn and cattle), and S. (provisions). Parl., mun., and co. bor. P. (1801) 11,300; (1851) 32,900; (1871) 42,900; (1891) 57,400.

Principal export port for the saltpetre (nitrate of soda), of which there are such abundant deposits in the Pampa del Tamarugal; with commerce also in borax, iodine, and copper and silver ores. Seven to ten miles from the town are the mines of Huantajaya, rich in silver, but difficult to work owing to the total absence of water, the water used either distilled or brought in special boats from Arica. A bad port; rocks and dangerous reefs prevent ships from coming nearer than 2 m. Lighters used, and these often loaded by men who wade in up to the belt on a muddy shore. Piers inadequate. Mean temp. Irak Arabi (ancient Land of Shinar, Babylonia, Chaldea; native name Sawâd, 'black earth'), a dist. of Asiatic Turkey rather larger than Italy lying around the lower courses of the Euphrates and Tigris, and comprising the southern portion of the vilayet of Bagdad, with the greater part of that of Busrah (exclusive of El Haza). The N. limit is marked by a line of low hills running ENE. from Haditha on the Euphrates, in 34° 8′ N.; S., the Persian Gulf; W., the scarp of the Syrian tableland; E., the Zagros Mts. on the Persian frontier. The country is almost entirely alluvial, flat, broken by a few hillocks. The total area of the alluvium is estimated by Sprenger at about 94,600 sq. m. A great part is desert or scrub-land, owing to want of water; the soil is exceptionally fertile, and where irrigated produces abundant crops. A very complete system of irrigation formerly existed; many of the ancient canals can still be traced, but, owing to neglect, often form unhealthy marshes. The region occupied by the successive caps. of Babylonia, and which Herodotus describes as the richest grain-producing country known to him, was provided with the most perfect system of canals. The most northerly of these, the Isa, leaving the Euphrates, passed Ambâr, and thence to the Tigris S. of Bagdad, giving off a network of canals, amongst which were situated the little towns of Mohawal and Kottrabol, the latter famed for its wine. W. of Bagdad the Isa passed through a region noted in early times for its fertility, but later a heath, which in 1884 was converted into a malarial swamp. S. of the Isa, at distances of 12 to 16 m. from each other, were four canals—Sarsar, King's, Huthâ, and Nil. The region watered by the King's Canal was in the height of its prosperity 2000 years ago, but even in the time of the Caliphate 360 villages were situated within its network of secondary canals. The main trunk served as an important link in the line of communication between Syria and Media. The climate [Bagdad, Busrah] is trying; subject to sudden variations of temperature. Towards the coast the air is oppressive, owing to great humidity. The S. wind dries up vegetation, and frequently brings a scourge of locusts. From 1856 to 1885 plague has never been absent from the country, shifting from one place to another. Bagdad suffered terribly from it in 1715, and was visited by other severe epidemics in 1772, 1800–02, and 1831–34. The country is scantily wooded; fruit-trees, as the fig, orange, &c., are met with only near the towns and rivers, with, in some places, large groves of date palm. The liquorice plant is abundant in the N., and is collected for export. Springs of naphtha and bitumen occur near the Tigris. The inhabitants are Arabs, belonging, it is said, to more than 100 tribes, settled or pastoral; the former, designated 'Madân,' are regarded with contempt by the Bedouins, who are by far the most numerous. Means of communication are very defective; there are no roads; inland transit is effected by means of pack animals. The Tigris is navigable by vessels drawing 4 ft., the Euphrates only by those of 2½ ft. On the former river regular steam communication is maintained between Bagdad and Busrah. See A. Sprenger, Babylonien, Heidelberg, 1886.

Irâwadi, or Irawaddy, the principal river of Burma, and one of the great rivers of SE. Asia, whose sources have never been discovered, but are generally accepted as being in the Namkiu Mts., at the NE. extremity of Assam, in about 28° N. General J. T. Walker, however, has advanced the theory that the Lu-kiang, which rises in the unknown far interior of Tibet, and has been generally held to be the upper waters of the Salwin, is, in fact, the ultimate source of the I. (See Proc. R. G. S., 1887, p. 352.) The river has been ascended to a few miles above the confluence of its two main arms in 25° 56′ N., 97° 38′ E., where it was found to be 500 yds. wide; at 20 m. above the confluence the E. arm was found to have a depth of 93 ft. Below the junction the river flows in a SSW. direction, between mountains 1200 to 2000 ft. high, where there are many rapids and whirlpools and narrow defiles, to Bhamo, 150 m., after which another defile, 5 m. long, is entered, but with smooth water, and a due S. course is taken to Mandalay. Below this the direction is SW. for another 150 m., in which distance it receives its principal tributary, the Chindwin, on its r. bk., and, turning to SSW., enters the Sea of Bengal, between the Gulf of Martaban and Cape Negrais, by nine principal mouths, on the most eastern of which Rangoon is situated. The delta commences a few miles below Prome, in lat. 18° 12′ N., at about 170 m. from the sea, and extends for 160 m. along the coast; it is constantly extending, owing to the immense quantity of silt brought down by the river. The I. is navigable at all seasons by steamers of light draught as high as Bhamo, 900 m. from its mouth; and a very large traffic is carried on. The value of the trade up and down is about 2½ millions sterling. Length of river and area of basin unknown. See Salwin.

Ireland (in poetic language, Erin, anciently Ierne, Hibernia, Iverna, or Juverna), isl., forming a principal member of the British Archipelago, situated in the North Atlantic Ocean, between 51° 27′ and 55° 23′ N., 5° 20′ and 10° 28′ W. It has the Atlantic on all sides except the E., where it is separated from Great Britain by St. George's Channel, Irish Sea, and the North Channel. Length from Fair Head to Mizen Head, about 300 m.; greatest breadth, 170 m. I. is divided into four provs. and thirty-two counties, as exhibited in the table on next page. I. is of a rhomboidal form, with a waved continuous outline on the E. coast, but indented by deep inlets on its other sides, so that no place in the island is more than 50 m. from the coast. On the N. and W. the coast is rock-bound. Surface mostly level. Most of its mountains, as the Wicklow, Mourne, Donegal, Mayo, Galway, and Kerry, are in isolated groups towards the coasts and extremities of the island surrounding a central plain, comprising a large extent of bog-land, and traversed by a few low hill ranges, as the Devil's Bit, Galtees, Mount Leinster, and Slievebloom. Carrantuohill, in M'Gillicuddy Reeks, Kerry, is the highest summit, and rises to 3414 ft. above the sea. Granite, flanked by Silurian strata, forms the Wicklow Range of mountains on the E. coast. The same primary rocks prevail in the Mourne Mts., and an extensive trap formation in Antrim of 800 sq. m. is succeeded by clay slate on the W. Granite again appears in the Galway Mts., and the Old Red Sandstone extensively prevails in Munster. The great plain in the centre, 250 to 300 ft. above the sea, is formed of Carboniferous Limestone, and contains six coal districts, the Leinster or Castlecomer, the Sleeve Arda in Tipperary, the Munster, Lough Allen, Monaghan, and Tyrone, besides a small coalfield in co. Antrim. Large areas are occupied by peat-bog and marsh-land. The country is well watered. Principal rivers, the Shannon, Surrow, Blackwater, Suir, Nore, Baun, Foyle, Boyne, Slaney, Liffey, Bandon, and Erne. Principal lakes, Neagh (the largest in the British Isles), Erne, Allen, Corrib, Mask, Conn, Ree, and Derg, besides the small but celebrated lakes of Killarney. The aggregate surface of the lakes is estimated at 336 sq. m. In I. the term lough, like the Scotch loch, is applied both to inland lakes and to inlets of the sea. As regards the climate, the numerous indentations of the sea, the extensive inland water area, and the wide distribution of the hills and mountains all conduce to an exceptional degree of moisture; and the direct exposure to the warm winds from the Atlantic likewise contributes to the general equality of temperature, and more especially promotes mild winter temperatures. The rainier tracts are the SW., W., and N. In the lowlands of the middle and eastern counties the mean rainfall is about equal to that of the midland counties of England in corresponding latitudes. The mean annual temperature ranges from about 48½° F. in the N. to 51½° in the S. The mean January temperature in nearly half the island is higher than anywhere in Great Britain, except Cornwall and W. Devon, and the western peninsulas of Wales. Westerly winds prevail for nine months in the year. Plants that generally require artificial heat in England to enable them to survive the winter, flourish here in the open air. The broad-leaved myrtle grows luxuriantly in some S. counties, and the arbutus-unedo, menziesia, and other plants of S. Europe flourish, while Alpine plants of the extreme N. of Europe are also found on some of the mountains. Agriculture.—I. is essentially an agricultural country, 43.7 per cent. of those pursuing definite occupations in I. having been engaged in this branch of industry in 1891; and as the condition of this industry throws most light on the remarkable decrease of population exhibited in the above table, it will be of interest to supply an exceptional amount of statistical information under this head; the statistics being mainly derived from Facts and Figures about Ireland, by T. W. Grimshaw, Registrar-General for I. (Dublin, 1893). The principal Irish crop is the potato, which is produced in greater quantity, relatively to population, in this country than in any other country in the world. On it the prosperity of I. and the number of its population still appear largely to depend, a rather serious fact in consideration of the great fluctuations in its produce per acre. Since 1850 its yield per acre has varied from 1.3 ton (1879) to 6.4 tons (1853 and 1855). A bad year accordingly produces widespread distress. Formerly, however, the population of I. generally was even more dependent on this crop than at present, and the diminution in its population, which has been so long going on, dates from a great failure of the crop in 1846, and a consequent famine in 1846-47. In 1845 the population of I. was estimated by Dr. Grimshaw to have reached 8,295,000, and the number of deaths from the famine, and the diseases consequent thereon, is calculated by the same authority at about 729,000. In the tables that here follow we see the effects not merely of the decline of population that then took place, and which continued in consequence of the continued flow of the stream of emigration which set in at that time, but also, under some heads, of the depression in agriculture which, especially since the beginning of the eighties, has affected the British Isles generally, and even to a large extent the whole of western Europe:—

* At the censuses of 1841 and 1851 the army and navy serving in Ireland were not included as they were in subsequent censuses.

† At the census of 1891 there were only six counties in which the number of persons speaking Irish only exceeded 1000. These were Galway (17,646), Donegal (7037), Kerry (4481), Mayo (4234), Cork (2273), and Waterford (1321).

‡ From the 1st of May 1851 to the end of 1890 the total number of emigrants from Ireland, including those to Great Britain, was 3,408,000. In recent years the annual number of emigrants has been about 70,000, about five-sixths of whom went to U.S., from 4000 to 6000 to Great Britain.

[1] Including meadow and clover and grass (see below).

In this first table, the most striking feature is the great decline in the cropped area, and especially in the area under corn crops. It is to be noted, however, that there is no such great decline in the total area in use for agriculture; and such decline as is shown under this head, as well as the increase under the head of bog, &c., is more apparent than real, inasmuch as since 1877 greater care has been observed in distinguishing between grass-lands actually in use for agriculture, and such as are too stony for the purpose. The next table shows that, as in Great Britain, in the case of the three principal corn-crops wheat is that most seriously affected by adverse circumstances. The decline in the wheat area of I. began earlier than in England, having been almost continuous since 1847. On the other hand, we may note that this table shows a satisfactory rise in the average yield per acre both of wheat and oats.

The next two tables relate to green crops, grass, and flax. The first of them shows that it is chiefly the increase under the heads of meadow and clover and grass that make up for the losses that have taken place under other heads. The cultivation of flax has long been a specialty of Irish as distinguished from British agriculture, and in I. is now mainly pursued in the Ulster counties, and more particularly those nearest Belfast, the great seat of the linen industry. It has been subject to considerable fluctuations, but has declined on the whole pretty steadily since 1864, when the area under this crop reached its maximum (302,000 ac.).

The next tables show the most satisfactory side of Irish agriculture, revealing, as they do, a great increase under the head of live-stock corresponding to the increased extent under grass, meadow and clover. Relatively to population, indeed, I. produces, in the aggregate, greater numbers of the larger live-stock than any other country in Europe, for which statistics are obtainable, although it is surpassed in one case by one country, in other cases by others under the individual heads. While the first table shows an absolute increase in numbers under every head except horses on a comparison of the last with the first decade, the second table shows an increase under this head also relatively to population. A fairly satisfactory state of matters is likewise shown, notwithstanding foreign competition both in live-stock and in frozen meat, under all heads by the third and fourth tables, relating to the last years individually.

The Irish seas abound in fish, but the table below shows that the fishing industry is in a declining condition. The decline is no doubt mainly due to the fact that a large part of the emigration from I. has taken place from those districts in which the industry was most largely pursued, and where the people lived largely on this food. The principal fishing-grounds are off the N. and NW. coasts (N. of Connaught to the N. of Donegal), off the SW. coasts (Kerry and Cork), and off the E. coast of Wexford. There are trawling grounds off the S. coast of Wexford, and between Dublin and Dundalk Bays. In the NW. the development of the fisheries is hindered principally by the inadequate means of communication with the English market, in the SW. by the want of sufficient landing accommodation, in the W. of I. generally by the lack of curing establishments. Such fishing as is pursued in Irish waters is to a large extent carried on by boats from England, Scotland, and the Isle of Man, the deep-sea (chiefly mackerel) fisheries off the W. coast to a large extent by French boats. The Irish of the W. coast are generally without the boats and apparatus necessary for carrying on the fisheries in these stormy waters.

The mineral resources of I. are very scanty compared with those of the sister island, their total annual value being less than $\frac{1}{25}$th of that of the United Kingdom generally, less than $\frac{1}{10}$th of that of Scotland. The greatest aggregate value belongs to stone, clay, slate, &c. (the last produced chiefly in cos. Cork and Tipperary). The next in value is coal, Castlecomer being the chief producing centre, but the whole production amounting to little more than 100,000 tons. Peat, of which there is a vast area in the island, is largely used for domestic fuel, and to some extent even industrially. Next after coal ranks iron ore, the only important deposits of which at present worked are the aluminous hematites of Antrim. Rock-salt is produced to a considerable amount at Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, and white salt is made from it at various places. Among other mineral products are alum, clay (co. Antrim), barytes (in Connaught and Munster), bog ore (used mainly for purifying gas, and principally produced in Londonderry dist. with Coleraine), fire-clay (co. Tyrone), and iron pyrites (co. Wicklow). The manufacturing industries of I. suffer from the dearth of local coal supplies; but there is one branch, the linen manufacture, for which I. has long been famous, and is still more largely carried on here than in any other part of the United Kingdom. In former times it was carried on domestically all over I., but it is now centred chiefly in Belfast, which has the greatest advantages in the way of obtaining the raw material, supplies of fuel from the neighbouring ports of Scotland, and for exporting the manufactured products. The only other textile industry of importance is the woollen, the growth of which was greatly hindered by the repressive legislation of William III.'s and subsequent reigns in the 18th century, but which has for some time back, as one of the tables below shows, made satisfactory progress. This industry, unlike the linen, is scattered over different parts of I., and it may be noted that formerly at least (in recent years we have no information on this head) it was largely maintained by the use of water-power. In 1870, 977 horse-power employed in this industry was derived from water against 187 from steam. The raw material employed is largely of native origin, some manufacturers using Irish wool exclusively, or almost exclusively.

Next in importance to the textile industries, in the aggregate (next to linen separately), is the production of whisky and beer (principally porter), the amount of which at different dates is shown below.

Means of Communication.—The general flatness of the middle portions of I. favoured the construction of canals, which, before the extension of the railway system, were of great importance as a means of transport both for passengers and goods. The Shannon, the longest river in the British Isles, has been partly canalised, and has thus been made navigable to the head of Lough Allen, that is, nor far from its source; and it is connected with Dublin, by two routes, and with Belfast. The Grand Canal proceeds from Ballinasloe, on the Suck, a r. bk. trib. of the Shannon, to Dublin, by way of Tullamore, the Royal Canal (now merged in the Midland Great Western Rly.) from Cloondara, on the Shannon (W. of Longford), by way of Longford and Mullingar. The Ballinamore and Ballyconnell Canal connects the Shannon with Upper Loch Erne, which again is connected with Lough Neagh and Belfast by the Ulster Canal and Lagan navigation. A branch from the Grand Canal proceeds S. to Athy, the limit of navigation on the Barrow. The Barrow and the Shannon are the most important rivers as regards navigation, but above Athlone the amount of shipping on the Shannon is quite insignificant. Irish railways date from 1842, when the first 14 m. were opened for traffic. In the remoter mountain valleys communications are still very defective, and since 1860 various acts have been passed with the view of promoting the construction of tramways and light railways in such dists., the most important being those of 1883, 1889, and 1890. The next table shows the progress that has been made in recent decades in Irish shipping.

The rate of growth of wealth in I. in recent decades may be taken as roughly indicated by the table below, though it must be remembered that there may have been a good deal of private hoarding even after the institution of savings' banks, before the advantages of the institution came to be appreciated.

Perhaps the most satisfactory indication of a general improvement in the condition of the Irish people since the famine is afforded by the classification of houses devised by Sir Thomas Larcom. According to this classification, the fourth class includes all single-room houses of mud or other perishable material; the third, a better class, with two to four rooms and windows; the second, a good farm or town house, with five to seven rooms and windows; and the first, all better houses. On a comparison of the census results of 1841 with those of 1891, it is found that whereas houses of the fourth class had decreased from 491,278 to 20,617, and those of the third class from 533,297 to 312,589, those of the second class had increased from 264,184 to 466,632, and those of the first from 40,080 to 70,740. On the other hand, increasing distress in a large section of the population appears to be shown by the increase in the last two decades of the average number of cases of pauperism relieved —the 'cases' including re-entries of the same individual.

Certain dists. of I., generally spoken of as the congested dists., are in a chronic state of distress; and in the Land Act of 1891 special provisions were introduced, aimed at bringing about a gradual improvement of the condition of those parts of the country. A congested county is defined in that Act as one in which the inhabitants live in electoral divs. in which the total ratable value divided by the number of the pop. gives a sum of less than one pound ten shillings for each. Eight counties, Donegal, Leitrim, Sligo, Roscommon, Mayo, Galway, Kerry, and Cork, were found by the Board to be congested in this sense, and the total area of the congested dists. (chiefly in Donegal, Connaught, and the SW. peninsulas of Kerry and Cork) was found to be 3,608,569 ac., with a pop. in 1891 of 549,516. The board is empowered to make efforts to improve these dists. in connection with agricultural development, forestry, breeding of live stock and poultry, sale of seed potatoes and seed oats, amalgamation of small holdings, migration, emigration, fishing, weaving, and spinning, or any other suitable industries.

People.—The greater part of the Irish are descendants of the aboriginal Celts, with an admixture towards the N. of Saxons, and in later times of English and Scottish emigrants. Their dark complexion and smaller and more slender form of body, as well as their more volatile temperament, distinguish the Irish from the Saxon. The Erse, a dialect of the Celtic, is the native language, and is now chiefly used in the W. part of the country. (See the table of counties.) In the year 432 Christianity was introduced by St. Patrick. From the 8th to the 12th century, the country was the scene of perpetual warfare between the petty kings and their chiefs. In 1174 Henry II. of England conquered the country, and portioned it out among his Anglo-Norman followers. In the reign of King John the division into counties took place, and English laws and customs were partially introduced. But the powerful barons continued to resist the government of Henry VII., Elizabeth, and James I. with repeated outbreaks and rebellions. The most memorable of these were in 1641, 1689, and 1798. In 1800 the union of I. with England took place. In 1829 the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act was passed, in 1832 the Irish Reform Bill, in 1838 the Poor Law Bill. In 1844 the Irish repeal agitation was at its height, and in 1848 an insurrection of the populace took place, but was speedily put down. Discontent has since manifested itself in many ways, and led to various measures of remedial legislation (see below).

Local Government.—In early times tribal government prevailed, the people being divided into 'Fine' or 'Septs,' each under its chieftain or 'Cendfinne,' forming an organised unit, the members of which were mutually responsible. The 'Clann' was a larger div. comprising several 'fine.' The Tuath was the unit of terr., but it had also a genealogical significance; it was the terr. occupied by a 'clann' or a div. of one, under a 'Ri,' or chief. The Mor Tuath was a confederacy of 'tuatha,' under a great chief, the 'Ri Mor Tuatha.' The chieftain was elected from the ruling family, but not necessarily in the direct line. At the time of the English conquest, in the 12th century, I. was divided into four great confederacies of tribes, or kingdoms, Meath being reckoned as a fifth kingdom. These old territorial divs. are preserved in the four Provinces, except that Meath is included in Leinster. The provs. have no longer administrative importance. The following are the principal administrative areas at present existing:—The County proper (32) is the largest div. for the purpose of local govt. The div. began in 1210, and was not completed till 1603; in some cases the boundaries correspond to old tribal divs., in others new partitions have been made. The chief officials are the lord-lieutenant (in command of the militia) and the high sheriff, both appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant of I. The principal governing body is the Grand Jury, which was originally summoned to aid the Circuit Judges, but, subsequently, the control of the fiscal affairs of the county was also entrusted to it, and this now constitutes the most important function. The Grand Jurors (23) are chosen by the High Sheriff from freeholders and leaseholders with a property qualification of £50 and £100; one, at least, from each barony (see below). The Grand Jury is not a continuative body, being dismissed (with the exception of that of Dublin, where a committee is appointed) at the close of each assize; but certain permanent officials are appointed by it. The Grand Jury levies and administers the County Cess, a rate on real property, and 'one of the oldest and the largest of the local taxes;' but it has no power of initiating expenditure, that right belonging specially to the Presentment Sessions. The principal objects to which cess is applied are: the maintenance of roads and bridges (rather more than fifty per cent. of the total), lunatic asylums, salaries of county officers, infirmaries and fever hospitals, govt. debts, prison expenses, &c. About one-fourth of the presentments are obligatory by Act of Parliament. The Presentment Sessions include the Baronial Sessions, composed of county justices and from five to twelve cess-payers (the number being fixed and the representatives selected by the Grand Jury), and the County-at-large Sessions, composed of county justices and one cess-payer from each barony. These courts deal respectively with the expenditure for the barony and the county. The County Courts are the Civil Bill Court and the Court of Quarter-Sessions; the latter has criminal jurisdiction, and controls the licensing system. The Barony (327) is a div. of a county of English origin, corresponding to the 'Hundred.' It was formed by combining or sub-dividing old tribal areas, with the boundaries of which it generally coincides; some half baronies are now treated as separate ones. The Riding, a name borrowed from the English div., is used in Tipperary, Cork, and Galway, each of which has two ridings. The Quarter-Sessions divs. (95), Petty Sessions dists. (606), Constabulary divs. (204), and Coroners' dists. are minor judicial areas. A single Court Leet still exists in the manor of Killultagh; it includes the town of Lisburn. The townland, the smallest div. and the unit of nearly all administrative areas, corresponds most nearly to the ancient 'plowland.' The parish (2428), a sub-div. of the barony, originally an eccles. div., was early adopted as a civil area, though never of much importance. It is now taken account of mainly in assessing damages for malicious injury, in the formation of petty sessions dists., and for the levying of county cess. The eccles. par., not always identical with the civil, is of no political importance. The poor-law system is similar to that of England. The Poor-Law Union (160), established under the Irish Poor-Law Act of 1838, consists of a group of electoral dists., each of which comprises several townlands. The local authority is the Board of Guardians, composed of representatives elected by the ratepayers and of county justices; the property qualification of the former, determined for each union by the Local Government Board for Ireland, varies from £6 to £30. Besides the relief of the poor, the Board of Guardians has been entrusted with a number of miscellaneous functions, including the administration of the Medical Charities, Vagrant, and Sanitary Acts; various Acts relating to Children, River Pollution, Cattle Disease, National Teachers, Jury, Valuation, Parliamentary Voters, Income Tax, &c., &c. Rural Sanitary dists. are co-extensive with unions, except that Urban Sanitary dists. are excluded. The latter include all towns of over 6000 pop. An Electoral div. (3446) is a group of townlands, with a single exception (St. Mary's, Drogheda union), confined to one county. A Dispensary dist. (721), created under the Medical Charities Act, 1851, consists of a group of electoral dists. Registration dists. (formed 1864) coincide with, or are divs. of, electoral dists. Superintendent Registrar's dists. are co-extensive with the union. A Registration county comprises a group of registration dists. This div. has been necessitated by the fact that some unions extend into two counties. Parliamentary divs. (100) are divs. of counties and bors. formed mainly under the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885. Other minor administrative areas are Lunatic Asylum, Arterial Drainage, Inland Navigation, and Harbour Board's dists. Towns are administered under various Acts, chief of which are the Lighting and Cleansing, 1828; Municipal Corporation Reform, 1840; Towns Improvement, 1854; under one or other of which any town with population of 1500 may provide for its own government. The local authorities under the Act of 1840, which regulates the most important towns, are the Mayor, Aldermen, and Councillors; all others are governed by Commissioners; eight towns are counties of cities or bors., each having its own Grand Jury and High Sheriff. The tribal system of land tenure, under which the clansmen had a claim on the land, was declared illegal in 1605, and replaced by the English common law. The principal Acts of the present century affecting the tenure of land are the Encumbered Estates Act, and the Acts of 1870, 1881, 1885, and 1891. Previous to 1870, the tenant (except where the right known as the 'Ulster Custom' prevailed) had no security for any improvements effected by him. The landlord might increase the rent or evict. The Act of 1870 provided for compensation to the tenant in case of eviction, but the rent might still be raised. The Act of 1881 enacted that the tenant should enjoy undisturbed occupation, at a fixed rent to be determined by a court of valuation. The Irish Land Commission, consisting of three Commissioners, was established for this purpose, and also authorised to settle disputes between landlord and tenant. Two more Commissioners were added under the Land Purchase Act of 1885, under which loans were granted to facilitate the purchase of the land by the tenant. Extended powers were conferred by the Act of 1891. The main points of the 'Home Rule' Bill, introduced into Parliament in 1893, were the establishment of a separate legislature, consisting of a Legislative Council and a Legislative Assembly; the former to consist of forty-eight councillors, elected for eight years, half retiring every four years; the latter of 103 members, to be returned by the existing parliamentary constituencies, and to continue for five years, unless previously dissolved; the country to send a certain number of representatives to the Imperial Parliament, the authority of which should continue supreme; the executive authority to be vested in the Lord-Lieutenant and an Executive Committee of the Privy Council; the Legislature to have power 'to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland,' in so far as not affecting Imperial interests, vested rights, religious liberty, and established forms of justice; the revenue, subject to certain charges for Imperial and other specified purposes, to be applied by the Legislature to the public service. Elementary education is controlled by the Commissioners of National Education. Under the Irish Education Act, 1892, education is compulsory (subject to certain exceptions) in towns and townships under commissioners; local authority, the council or commissioners. The Intermediate Education Board examines all candidates who present themselves. The Board is annually entrusted with a portion of the funds accruing since the disestablishment of the Irish Church, to be applied to the payment of results fees to teachers. There are two universities in I. recognised by the State, Dublin University (founded 1591) and the Royal University. The latter is only an examining body, founded by royal charter in 1880; but a university education is afforded at the three Queen's Colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway, founded in 1849. The Royal College of Surgeons, Dublin, is a teaching body under the Science and Art Department, S. Kensington. There is also the Catholic University of I., founded in 1854 by a bull of Pope Pius IX., which grants degrees in theology and philosophy, but since 1882 sends up its students to the examinations of the Royal University for degrees in arts, medicine, engineering, and law. Affiliated to this university are St. Patrick's College, Maynooth; University College, Dublin; St. Patrick's College, Carlow; the French College, Blackrock; Holy Cross College, Clonliffe; and the Medical School, Cecilia Street, Dublin. Very hilly in S., where it reaches the border of the high plateau of central Asia, and embraces the alpine tracts which fringe the plateau; namely, the border ridge of Sayan, attaining its highest summit in Munku-Sardyk (12,000 ft., snow-line at about 10,000 ft.); the Alps of Tunka, on l. bk. of Irkut R.; the Kitoi Alps, between the Kitoi and Byelaya Rivs.; the many unnamed parallel chains, all running NE. in the upper basin of the Oka, and the auriferous chains of the upper Uda (Nizhneudinskaya taiga), all attaining in their peaks the alt. of 6–8000 ft. The broad depression of the Angara separates these mountains from the Baikal Mts. (6–7000 ft.), which run NE. along the NW. shore of Lake Baikal. Further NE. begin the alpine highlands of the Vitim and Olekma system. The mountains are built up of granites, gneisses, Laurentian and Cambrian schists, and Silurian limestones and slates; mighty flows of lava are met with all along the border of the plateau, and an extinct volcano, which was probably active in Post-Tertiary times, on the Chinese frontier, at the sources of Junbulak, upper l. bk. trib. of Oka. Silurian limestones and Devonian red sandstones fringe the Alpine tracts, forming high plains 1500–2500 ft. of altitude, covered with occasional layers of marine Carboniferous and freshwater Jurassic, Tertiary and Post-Tertiary deposits. The govt. of I. is rich in metals and minerals; gold is extracted in considerable quantities in the highlands of the Uda, as well as those of the l. bk. tribs. of the Vitim (especially Mama). Graphite of high quality has been extracted from Mount Alibert, and lapis-lazuli from the mountains at SW. corner of Lake Baikal. Rich iron ores; layers of Jurassic brown coal in the basin of Angara and lower Irkut; mineral springs on the Irkut (Nilova Pustyñ). The chief artery of I. is the Angara (q.v.), or Verkhnyaya Tunguska, which flows from Lake Baikal N. and W. to join the Yenisei, and is used for floating light boats in its middle course, and for navigation in its lower course. It receives from the left a number of large tribs.: Irkut, 240 m.; Kitoi, 180 m.; Byelaya, 200 m.; Oka, 550 m., with Iya; and Uda, or Tasyeeva (tribs. Ona, Kan, &c.). Of the r. bk. tribs. of the Angara, the Ilim (260 m.) is the largest. The Lena waters I. for nearly 1200 m., and is navigated from Kachug. It receives the Kirenga (350 m.), the Chuya, and the navigable Vitim, which flows on the N. frontier of the govt. The Nizhnyaya Tunguska, also a trib. of Yenisei, waters the NW. part of I. Climate very severe, the average temp. of I. (52° 17′ N., 104° 11′ E.; alt. 1350 ft.) being, yr. 31° F., Jan. −6°, July 65°. The whole of the Alpine tracts and large parts of the plains are covered with forests. The pop. is chiefly Russian (60 per cent.) and Buryate (39 per cent.), the remainder being a few Yakutes and Tunguses. The chief occupation of both the Russians and the Buryates is agriculture, corn being exported to some extent to the gold-washings; cattle-breeding, especially with the Buryates; hunting, and fishing in Lake Baikal. The transport of tea along the highway to Russia, and of Russian goods to I. and Transbaikalia, is a considerable source of income. Important gold washings in SW.; manufactures in infancy. Divided into five dists.: Irkutsk, Balagansk, Verkholensk, Kirensk, and Nizhneudinsk. Area, 287,061 sq. m. P. (1862) 363,375; (1890) 421,190.

Irtysh (Kalmuck Irtsis, or Ertsis), riv. of W. Siberia, l. bk. trib. of the Obi; rises in Chinese Empire, in a chain of mountains, often described as Great Altai, 70 m. WSW. of Kobdo, under the name of Ky I., and further down Kara I. (Black I.), flows W. for nearly 450 m., and after having received numbers of small tribs. from the above mountains, and passed a couple of miles from Lake Ulungur, enters Lake Zaisan. On issuing from this lake it crosses the SW. part of the Altai Mts. in a gorge, which becomes very narrow and picturesque above Ust Kamenogorsk, where it emerges on the plains and flows NW. for nearly 2000 m. past Semipalatinsk, Omsk, and Tara. At Tobolsk, after having received the Tobol from the S., it turns N. to join the Obi at Samarovskoye. In these two parts of its course it receives many important tribs., Narym and Bukhtarma in the Altais, Chaganka (l. bk.), Om, Tara (r. bk.), and especially the Ishim and the Tobol, which are both large navigable rivers. It is navigated for nearly 2000 m. as far as Semipalatinsk, and metals are shipped even from Bukhtarma. In its middle course it is open for navigation for an average of 200 days. Isère, dep., SE. France, bounded on the W. and N. by the Rhone, and stretching SE. into the heart of the Alps, formed from various dists. of Dauphiné, and divided into four arrs.: Grenoble (cap.), Saint-Marcellin, La Tour-du-Pin, and Vienne. The course of the Isère (above Grenoble) and that of its important trib., the Drac, divides the dep. into two regions, that to the S. and E. characterised by massive mountains of granite, gneiss, talc, and schist; that to the N. and W. by calcareous ranges, level plateaux, plains, and valleys. Forests abound round Grenoble, and were formerly much more extensive, especially in the Oisans. The smaller E. section is again divided into two by the profound gorge of the Romanche, to the S. of which lies the Oisans, with the highest point of the dep. in the mountains of Pelvoux, the Meije, or Aiguille du Midi (alt. 13,075 ft.), and to the N. the mountains containing the Grandes Rousses (alt. 11,390 ft.) and the Chaine de Belledonne (alt. 9780 ft.). The larger western section is subdivided into three, first a mountainous region in the S., between the Isère and the Drac, including in the SE. a continuation of the Dévoluy, and containing valleys (mainly parallel to the Drac) traversed by the railway from Grenoble to Sisteron; second, to the N. of these mountains the Grande Chartreuse, bounded on the SE. by the beautiful and fertile valley of Grésivaudin, traversed by the Isère, and on the SW. by a further continuation of the Isère valley; and third, to the W. of both of these nearly half the dep. composed of low plateaux, hills, and low-lying plains. Climate varies with altitude [Grenoble], and the mean rainfall increases from W. to E. The productions are similar to those of the other Alpine deps. [Alpes Basses, &c.]. The vine occupies more than 2 per cent. of the surface, but the relative production is much under the average for France. In the production of tobacco it ranks second among the deps. of France. Principal minerals, iron ore and coal, the former chiefly from Allevard, Saint-Quentin, and Verpillière, the latter from Mure and Bourg-d'Oisans. Marble is fairly common, but the most valuable quarry, that of Valsenestre, cannot yet be worked on account of the absence of roads; the marble of Echaillon is exported to all parts of Europe. The marshes of Bourgoin yield peat. Area, 3180 sq. m. P. 572,100. See France, table.

Isère, the ancient Isara, riv., France, rises on the N. slope of Mt. Iséran, dep. Savoie, flows tortuously W. and SW. through the deps. Isère and Drôme, passing Albertville, Grenoble, and Romans, and joins the Rhone 4 m. above Valence. Nominally navigable 90 m. from Montmélian, but with much difficulty, owing to islands and shoals. Chief tribs., the Arc and Drac. Discharge below the confluence of the Drac at low tide 3700 cubic ft. per second, at flood 353,200 cubic ft. Length, 150 m. See Alps, Passes, I. (9) and (10).

Ispahan, or Isfahan (according to Curzon, the latter form indicates the pronunciation now prevailing, but the former is nearer the ancient form, in Zend, Sepahân, in Greek, Aspadanê, which may be derived either from an old Persian word meaning 'a horse-stud,' or one meaning 'a camp'—Egli), city, and formerly the cap. of Persia, prov. Irak-Ajemi, 218 m. S. by E. Teheran. It is enclosed by orchards and gardens in a fine fertile plain on the Zendeh Rud, here crossed by fine noble bridges, connecting with its suburb Julfa (q.v.). It was one of the richest and most populous cities of Asia under Shah Abbas the Great in the 17th century; but in 1722, during the Afghan invasion of Persia, its walls were destroyed, and it was reduced to a state of decay, from which it has never recovered, and in which condition much of its site remains. Principal remaining edifices are the Meidan-i-Shah, or Royal Square, in the centre of the city, one of the most imposing piazzas in the world, laid out by Shah Abbas, surrounded by a long low range of buildings, divided into two storeys of recessed arches one above the other; the Musjid-i-Shah, or Royal Mosque; and the Chehel Situn, or Hall of Forty Pillars, forming part of the royal palace. In spite of its physical decay I. is still the second largest trading emporium in Persia, yielding supremacy only to Tabriz, its commerce extending E. and W. considerably beyond the confines of the empire. Its exports are chiefly opium, tobacco, carpets, almonds, and rice; imports consist of manufactured cotton and woollen goods, copper, tin and zinc, sugar, glass, &c., of which four-fifths are English or Indian. The manufactures comprise printed calicoes, armour, chiselled brass ware, pottery, tiles. It is also the most important book market in Persia. P. 70–80,000.

Istria, part of the Coast Province (q.v.) of Austria-Hungary, comprising the penin. of I. and the isls. of Veglia, Cherso, and Lussin. The northern parts of the terr. are mountainous, the mountains belonging to the Karst (q.v.). The Istrian Karst is divided into well-defined plateaux and hilly ranges. The most important mountain is the Monte Maggiore, or Caldiera (4570 ft.), rising near the Gulf of Quarnero. The Karst dists. are arid and sparsely inhabited, but the southern parts of the peninsula, which gradually slope down towards the Adriatic, are fertile and densely peopled. The climate of I. is mild and dry, and resembles that of Italy. Violent north-easterly storms, called bora, are much dreaded on the coast, and also the sirocco, blowing from SSE., is of no rare occurrence there. Frosts are exceptional, but occasionally they prove destructive to the olive plantations of I. The inhabitants are, with very few exceptions, Italians and Slavs. The latter occupy the uplands, whilst the Italians inhabit the fertile maritime regions. Pola, Rovigno, Parenzo, Capo d' Istria, and the other maritime towns of I. are quite Italian. The principal products of I. are olive-oil, wine, figs and other fruits, galls, various kind of barks, timber, bay-salt, and cattle. Of industries, shipbuilding has to be mentioned. Coal is worked at Carpano, and alum at Sovigrano. Area of I., 1910 sq. m. P. 300,000. [H. G. S.]

[1] There was no census in 1891. The figures below are calculated on the assumption of the same mean rate of increase as that for the period 1871–81 being continued in 1881–91.

[2] Piedmont and Liguria, the joint population of which, at the end of 1861, was 3,536,000.

[3] Population, including Mantua, as at present, end of 1861, 3,257,000.

[1] Population in 1857, 2,294,000.

[2] Composed solely of the prov. of Perugia. Pop. end of 1861, 513,000.

[3] Population, end of 1861, 883,000.

[4] Population, end of 1861, 1,826,000.

[5] Composed solely of the prov. of Rome.

[6] Composed solely of the prov. of Potenza.

[7] Population, end of 1861, 2,392,000.

[8] Population, end of 1861, 588,000.

[9] Not the sum of the figures above, but calculated independently.

The external dominion of I. embraces the colony of Eritrea on the Red Sea, the protectorate of Aussa and the Dankali or Afar territory, and a sphere of influence comprising Abyssinia and its dependencies in virtue of the treaty of the 2nd of May 1889, in the 17th article of which 'the king of the kings of Ethiopia agrees to avail himself of the government of the king of Italy in the arrangement of all affairs with other powers or governments,' and the Somali country as far as the mouth of the Jub, but with the exception of certain maritime strips belonging to England and France (see Somali-land).

The navigable rivers of Italy are nearly all confined to the northern plain. The Po is navigable for boats to Turin, for steamers to Valenza, seven miles below the confluence of the Sesia; the Ticino is navigable from its issue from Lake Maggiore; the Adda from its issue from Lake Como; the Adige from a little below Bozen in Tirol (Austria); the Bacchiglione from Vicenza; the Brenta from Padua. In the peninsular portion of the country the only navigable rivers are the Arno and the Tiber, the former being navigable by boats to Florence, the latter by steamers to Rome, and by smaller boats sixty miles higher up. Besides those just mentioned, the principal Italian lakes are Garda (a small part of which in the N. belongs to Austria-Tirol), Lugano (half Swiss and half Italian), the lagoons known as the Valli di Comacchio, and the lakes of the Apennines (q.v.), Trasimeno, Bolsena, and Bracciano. The climate is roughly illustrated by the particulars in the following table, in which the stations selected are arranged in the order from N. (top) to S. (bottom):—

The January temperatures of Bologna, Genoa, and Florence are specially noteworthy. The furthest apart of these stations in latitude are within 45′ of each other (Bologna and Florence), nearly in the same longitude. The temperature in the case of Florence as compared with Bologna exhibits the advantage derived from the shelter of the Apennines against cold northerly winds, at Genoa the additional advantage of proximity to the sea. The predominance of late autumnal rains shown in this table is found to obtain at nearly all the meteorological stations of the kingdom. The very light summer rains of the southern stations are characteristic of the Mediterranean in general [Europe, climate]; but if we make a comparison with Spain and Portugal, it is important to observe that in Italy the only parts to the S. of the parallel of 40° N. are the southern half of the isl. of Sardinia, the whole of Sicily, and portions of the smaller peninsulas of the mainland. The mountains of I. promote the rainfall, especially since they descend to the sea on both sides. Even the plain on the N. of the Apennines is not deprived of rain through the intervention of these mountains, since the rain-bearing winds are forced to ascend still higher by the loftier ranges of the Alps. Out of thirty stations enumerated in the Statistical Annuary for Italy for 1892, snow fell on the average of the three years, 1889–91, on 10 days or more at seven, viz. (in the order of frequency), Aquila (30.9 days), Potenza (28.6 days), Camerino, Urbino, Cosenza, Bologna, and Turin. A large part of I. suffers greatly from malaria, the largest areas so affected being one bordering the W. coast, from the lat. of Elba nearly to that of Naples, and including the marshes of Grosseto and Orbetello, the Roman Campagna, and the Pontine marshes; the region round and including the promontory of Gargano, and extending thence S. to the Gulf of Taranto; a large part of Sicily, especially the S. and SE., including even tracts at a high elevation, and nearly the whole of Sardinia. (See Petermann's Mitteil., 1895, p. 46, and pl. 3.) Under the laws of the 25th of June 1882 and the 4th of July 1886, provision is made for the improvement of such areas. The necessary works are divided into two classes—(1) those in which increased salubrity is chiefly aimed at, and (2) those in which a great agricultural improvement is combined with hygienic advantages. The state is empowered to contribute half the expenses of the works under the first head, but those of the second class have to be carried out either by individual proprietors or voluntary or compulsory associations of proprietors. The whole improvable area is estimated at about 2700 sq. m., of which about 2160 sq. m. would, under these laws, have to be improved directly or indirectly by the state. The area on which the necessary improvements had already been carried out (principally in the provs. of Rovigo, Padua, Venice, Ferrara, Ravenna, Grosseto, and Aquila) amounted at the end of 1891 to 1215 sq. m.

The snows and glaciers of the Alps are important economically, as helping to maintain the volume of the innumerable streams which descend from them, and thus increased the supply of water for irrigation, which has been carried out on a more extensive scale in I. than anywhere else in Europe. The irrigated area in the Po basin is about equal in size to the counties of Lincoln and Norfolk combined. Under the laws of Dec. 25, 1883, and Feb. 28, 1886, the state is authorised to make advances for some of the necessary works for the extension of irrigation. Among the projects which have been studied under these laws is one for the construction of the Emilian Canal, which would take off from the S. bank of the Po opposite the confluence of the Ticino (in the SE. of Lombardy), and proceed for a length of 185 m., mainly through Emilia, terminating at the Marecchia (a small stream entering the sea at Rimini), and would, when finished, be capable of irrigating an area of 2868 sq. m., considerably larger than that of Devonshire. The area occupied by corn-crops is about twice as great as in the United Kingdom, over and above the area under vineyards, olive-yards, fruit-trees, flax and hemp, pasture-grasses, &c. The principal corn-crop is wheat. It covers from four to five times as great an area as in the United Kingdom, but the only Italian wheat that is noted for its quality is that of Apulia, in the SE., where there is grown a hard wheat well adapted for making maccaroni. Maize, the second Italian corn-crop in extent of acreage, furnishes the chief food of the people throughout a large part of the country. As the maize that falls to the lot of the poorer classes is often mildewed, the use of this standing dish is blamed as the cause of a disgusting disease known as pellagra, very prevalent among the Italians. Rice is the most valuable crop of the irrigated fields in the N.; and the production of wine is extending most rapidly in the southern parts of the country, above all Sicily. Most Italian wines are ill prepared, so that they deteriorate instead of improving with age. Among those in best repute are Marsala, grown in the W. of Sicily; Chianti, grown in the higher parts of Tuscany, to the S. of Florence; and Asti, grown on the southern slopes of the Piedmontese hills to the W. of Alessandria. The grass and forage crops of I. are of special importance in the irrigated plains. The meadows are regularly mown four times a year, and in some peculiarly favoured districts as many as nine crops have been known to be reaped in a single year from the same field. The richness of these meadows leads to a large trade, both export and import, cattle making up the greater number of the animals which are sent to France and elsewhere. But besides this export of cattle there is a large import of milk-cattle from Switzerland, these imported animals yielding a larger quantity of milk than the native breeds. When fed on irrigated meadows for ten months in the year Swiss cows produce 700 gallons of milk, as against about 550 gallons produced by the native cows. This large produce of milk gives rise also to a large trade in cheese. The famous Parmesan, Gorgonzola, and Stracchino cheese are all made in the plains of Lombardy, the first-mentioned, therefore, not as its name would indicate, in the province of Parma. The rearing of poultry is likewise characteristic of the agriculture of northern I. Both poultry and eggs are very largely exported, and Italian eggs now even reach England. Apulia, besides being noted for its wheat, is noted for its wool.

Sulphur, produced chiefly in Sicily, in the vicinity of Caltanissetta, Girgenti, and Catania, but also in the provs. Pesaro e Urbino, Ancona, Forlì, Avellino, and Catanzaro, is the most important mineral product of the kingdom, making up more than half the annual value of all the mineral products. Iron ore of excellent quality is obtained in the isl. of Elba, and is exported chiefly to the United States. Ores of the same metal are worked in the Val Trompia, in Lombardy (prov. Brescia, between the lakes Iseo and Garda), and in other Alpine valleys (provs. Bergamo and Novara), in the isl. of Sardinia and elsewhere. Lead and zinc are important products of this island (the SW. round Iglesias). Copper ores are mined in the provs. of Grosseto, Genoa, and Belluno, and in trifling quantity in one or two others. Mercury is produced in Grosseto, silver in Sardinia (prov. Cagliari), gold in Piedmont (prov. Novara). Tuscany produces among the Apuan Hills in the N. the celebrated statuary marble of Massa and Carrara, and in a volcanic district in the S. (prov. Pisa) large quantities of boracic acid escape from the ground in the form of vapour, and the acid is concentrated in water, and then solidified. Mineral fuel exists chiefly in the form of lignite (provs. Arezzo, Perugia, &c.), and even that is far from abundant. Asphalt and bitumen are obtained in provs. Syracuse and Chieti, petroleum in Piacenza, rock-salt in provs. Girgenti, Caltanissetta, Cosenza, and elsewhere, brine-spring salt in Pisa and Parma. Eleven-twelfths of the Italian salt production is, however, sea-salt—chiefly in Sicily (above all prov. Trapani), Sardinia, Apulia (near Barletta), and the Valli di Comacchio. Of Italian manufacturing industries, the chief are those connected with silk, and especially the reeling and throwing of silk, and these industries are so intimately connected with the general economic condition of I. that a few details are important. The great seat of all branches of the Italian silk industry are the sub-Alpine provs., where there is a dense agricultural population, affording a large amount of cheap, yet efficient, female and child labour. About 70 per cent. of all those employed in the Italian silk industries are women, and more than two-thirds of the remainder children under 15. Of those employed in reeling, more than half belong to Lombardy, above all, provs. Como, Milan, and Bergamo, and more than four-fifths to the three sub-Alpine divs. of Piedmont, Lombardy, and Venetia. Lombardy alone employs four-fifths of those engaged in throwing, and 85 per cent. of those engaged in silk-weaving belong to the two provs. of Como and Milan, about half the entire number to the single commune of Como, where weaving is carried on almost exclusively in the houses of the weavers. The total production of raw, reeled, and thrown silk increased from about 6780 thousand lbs. in 1863, to about 7960 thousand lbs. in 1890, the greater part of this increase being derived from native cocoons. Cotton manufactures (chiefly in Lombardy, Piedmont, and Liguria), and woollen manufactures (chiefly in Piedmont and Venetia, more particularly in the provs. Novara, Vicenza, and Turin). The textile industries of I. in general, however, are mainly domestic, and are not concentrated in special districts. Factories with modern machinery are nevertheless arising. Water-power is for the most part employed along with steam, steam being resorted to to make up the deficiencies and irregularities of the other agent. The iron industry has been specially encouraged in recent years by the Italian government, with the view of making itself independent of foreign countries. Large works have been established at Terni, where advantage is taken of the enormous water-power furnished by the falls on the Nera, a l. bk. trib. of the Tiber, and where there is the further advantage of a supply of lignite at Spoleto, a few miles distant. Iron is obtained from Val Trompia, and the company is about to start blast-furnaces at Civita Vecchia, with the view of utilising the ore of Elba. Under the promise of government encouragement several English firms have established large engineering works at Naples, Pozzuoli, and elsewhere. In the special commerce of I. (under which head are included all articles that have paid customs duty), silk (raw and thrown), olive-oil, wine, and fruits make up more than 40 per cent. of the exports. Among the other leading exports are eggs, animals, sulphur, rice, hemp, and flax. Raw cotton, cotton manufactures, wheat, and coal are the principal imports (together above 20 per cent.), hides, timber, and wool, sugar, coffee, and fish being also imported in large amount. France (including Algeria), England, and Austria-Hungary furnish more than 60 per cent. of the imports, and France, Austria-Hungary, and Switzerland receive more than 60 per cent. of the exports, the share of France (with Algeria) amounting to more than 40 per cent. of the whole. It is also worthy of note that a very large proportion of Italian export commodities are sent abroad by land—through the Alpine tunnels. Among the most remarkable features of the recent history of Italian commerce, as regards commodities, are the rapid rise in the amount of coal, machinery, pig iron, and materials of the textile manufactures, especially raw cotton, imported, accompanied by a rapid decline in the import of cotton yarn, and a great rise in the amount of wine and fruit exported. There has also been an increase in the amount of Italian silk manufactures exported. As regards the countries trading with I., the most striking fact is the rapid rise of the percentage belonging to Germany both in the import and export trade. This is in large part due to the opening of the St. Gothard tunnel, the importance of which, in the trade between Italy and Germany, is well shown by the following details:—In 1880, before the opening of the St. Gothard tunnel, the quantity of iron and steel in plates and bars of 5 millimeters (0.2 in.) or more in thickness, imported into Italy from the United Kingdom, was nearly 60 per cent. of the total under this head (the largest under the general head of iron and steel), that from Germany 2 per cent. In 1890 the proportion derived from the United Kingdom was less than 22 per cent., that from Germany more than 52 per cent., and more than nine-tenths of Germany's share was introduced by land. The money, weights, and measures of I. are the same as those of France, the names mostly Italianised forms of the French ones. The franc is called the lira (libra), which is divided into 100 centesimi. The annual emigration from I. is greater than from any other country, except the United Kingdom and Germany. In 1871 the total number of Italians abroad was estimated at from 432,000 to 452,000, in 1881 at 1,032,000, in 1891 at 1,988,000. The permanent emigration (namely, of those leaving the country for an indefinite period) is directed chiefly to S. America (especially Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay), and next to the United States. A peculiar feature of Italian emigration, however, is the large number who annually leave the country for short periods. In 1892 the number of temporary emigrants was 116,000, against 107,000 emigrants in the usual sense of the term. The temporary emigration takes place chiefly from N. Italy, and consists mostly of labourers on railways, canals, and other great undertakings in neighbouring countries (France, Switzerland, Austria). The government of I. is a limited monarchy, the executive power belonging to the sovereign, and the legislative authority to king and parliament conjointly. The parliament consists of two chambers, the senate and the chamber of deputies, the members of the former being princes of the royal house when of age, and an unlimited number of persons (above forty years of age) nominated by the king for life, those only being eligible for nomination who fill high offices, have benefited the nation by their scientific, literary, or other attainments, or pay taxes to the annual value of £120. Deputies of the lower house (to the number of 508, each representing one electoral division) are elected by ballot by all citizens twenty-one years of age, able to read and write, and tax-payers to the amount of 19 lire 80 centesimi (about 16s.). Numerous classes have votes in virtue of their position (members of academies, professors, those who have served their country under arms for two years, &c.). Deputies must be thirty years of age, and, though unpaid, are able to travel free throughout I. by rail or steamer. Parliament (which the executive must summon annually) lasts five years; the king can dissolve the lower house at any time, but must order new elections within four months. I. is divided for administrative purposes into provs. and comms., each of the latter having communal and municipal councils, and a syndic, a government official, elected in the larger comms. by the former council by secret vote from among its own members, and in smaller comms. appointed by the king from among the communal councils. Provincial and communal councils are elected for five years, one-fifth renewable yearly, the former meeting once, the latter twice a year. For judicial purposes I. has twenty appeal courts, subdivided into tribunal districts, and these into magistracies. Finance.—The revenue is derived from direct taxes (on lands, houses, and incomes derived from movable capital and labour); indirect taxes; post telegraph, and other monopolies; incomes from state lands, railways, and a few other sources. Between the end of 1871 and the middle of 1892 the public debt (including the consolidated and redeemable debt) increased at the rate of about £7,200,000 per annum. Military (or naval) service is compulsory, and the period is for nineteen years. A certain portion (200,000) of all youths over twenty years is levied annually, 82,000 are drafted into the standing army, the remainder entered in a second and third category. Recent legislation tends to increase the period of service for certain classes, and a commission is entrusted with the consideration of this and other changes. Young men of superior education are allowed, under certain conditions, to serve as one-year volunteers. The principal passes of the Alps on the Continental frontier are to be defended by fortifications, now in process of execution. The Po basin is also studded with forts, the chief being those of Casale, Piacenza, Cremona, Peschiera, Verona, Mantua, Legnago (the last four form the old Austrian Quadrilateral), Pavia, Boara, Venice, Alessandria, and Bologna. On the coast and islands are various other fortified places—Ventimiglia, Vado, Genoa, Spezia, Elba, and others on the Gulf of Naples, works in the Straits of Messina, various places in Sicily, Sardinia (N. and S.), and at the mouth of the Adige. Rome is walled and protected by a circle of forts. Roman Catholicism is the state religion, and embraces all but a small fraction of the people, though freedom is allowed to all other creeds. Public education is under state control, and no private school may be kept without authorisation. Elementary education for children between six and nine is nominally compulsory, except when the supply of teachers is below the proportion required for the communal population. The number of people above school age still unable to read and write is, in fact, still remarkably large, the proportion increasing on the whole from N. to S. Still the number is declining. The percentage of males of twenty and upwards unable to read and write at the census of 1861 was 65.47; in 1871, 60.17; in 1881, 53.89: females, 1861, 81.52; 1871, 77.18; 1881, 72.93. From 1875 to 1890 there was a nearly steady increase in the percentage of conscripts able to read and write on enrolment from 46.45 to 58.19, and the percentage of those able to read and write on leaving the army in 1893 was 76.01. Schools may be classified as providing (1) elementary instruction; (2) secondary instruction, classical; (3) secondary instruction, technical; (4) higher education. In the first class (consisting of two grades, only the lower of which is compulsory, both free) religious instruction is optional. The second class comprise ginnasi and licei, the latter of which lead to the universities. Technical education is supplied by technical schools and institutes, and institutes for the mercantile marine. Higher education is supplied by the universities, seventeen of which (Bologna, Cagliari, Catania, Genoa, Macerata, Messina, Modena, Naples, Padua, Palermo, Parma, Pavia, Pisa, Rome, Sassari, Siena, and Turin) are government institutions, and four (Camerino, Ferrara, Perugia, and Urbino) free, and university courses are given in three licei (at Aquila, Bari, and Catanzaro). Towards all these institutions the state contributes, the provs., comms., foundations, and in the case of the universities their own ancient revenues supplying other support. At the census of 1881 there were nine towns (Naples, Milan, Rome, Turin, Palermo, Genoa, Florence, Venice, and Bologna) having a population of over 100,000, five of 50,000 to 100,000, and eighteen of 30,000 to 50,000. Historical Notes.—Until 49 B.C. the name 'Italy' was given to that little narrow strip in the extreme S. between the Gulfs of I., Eufemia and Squillace. Although of the original inhabitants of Italy the Etruscans have left vestiges of an advanced civilisation, its authentic history begins with that of Rome some 300 years B.C. A century later the Romans had conquered all within the Alps and what is now called Italy, and it continued under Roman rule up to the fall of the Western Empire in 476 A.D., when it was replaced by that of the Ostrogoths until their conquest by the Eastern Empire in 554. In 568 the Lombards invaded Italy, founding a kingdom in the N., which included Tuscany, and a portion of which still bears their name as Lombardy; and to the S. the duchies of Spoletum and Beneventum, while the remainder of I. owned the suzerainty of the Greek or Eastern Empire. The Lombards, defeated by Pepin, king of the Franks, in 755, were finally subjugated by his son Charlemagne in 774, crowned emperor of the Romans in 800. The Carolingian line ended in 888, and for seventy-four years after, ten sovereigns allied to the race of the Franks disputed the crown. Finally in 962 Otto the Great of Saxony was called in and made emperor, from which period the title was always borne by a German king, and Italy considered a fief of the German Empire. There were four emperors of the Saxon dynasty, followed by four of the Franconian, from 1024 to 1125. In 1138 the sovereignty of I. passed to the Swabian family, one of the greatest that ever held it. It was at this time that the names of Guelf and Ghibelin originated, coming to denote the two factions of the popes and emperors respectively, and which, following on the Concordat of Worms in 1122, further consolidated papal independence. At this period too the Normans, by successive conquests extending over a century, for ever displaced the Greek empire in southern Italy, and by 1138 had founded the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, which they professed to hold as a fief of the Holy See. Moreover, the temporal power of the Papacy, originating with the advent of the Carolingians, was still more strengthened by its formal acknowledgment by the Emperor Rudolf of Habsburg in 1278. In 1194 the Emperor Henry VI. conquered the Norman kingdom and united all Italy under the imperial power, which now stood at its height. But the Swabian line ended in 1254, and with it the great predominance of the German emperors in I. In the interval until the French invasion of 1494 I. greatly flourished in spite of its constant wars. The power in the N. became settled in the commonwealths of the cities, and that in the S. from 1266 had passed to the House of Anjou, who, however, lost Sicily to Peter of Aragon in 1282. In central I. the popes held in direct dominion that part stretching from Terracina in a NE. direction to the mouth of the Po. From 1494 to 1529 I. was invaded no less than six times by the French, under Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Francis I., becoming the battle-ground of the rival pretensions of the Spaniards and Imperialists on one side, and of the French on the other. These wars greatly devastated the country, and exposed its people to much cruel suffering. Ultimately they were put a stop to by the peace of Cambray in 1529, which left the Spaniards firmly established as masters of the Two Sicilies and Sardinia, and Charles V. undisputed liege lord of I., crowned emperor in 1530. In 1537 the dominions of the Dukes of Savoy were conquered by the French, and only restored after the peace of Câteau Cambresis of 1559, when Venice, Genoa, and Lucca (S. Marino not reckoned) were the sole commonwealths left. The war of the Spanish Succession led to the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, by which the Italian dominions of Spain passed to Austria, excepting the island of Sicily, given to Victor Amadeus of Savoy, with the title of king. But in 1720 Victor Amadeus had to exchange Sicily for Sardinia with Austria, and take the title of king of Sardinia instead. By the treaty of Vienna of 1738, following on the war of the Polish Succession, the Two Sicilies passed to Don Carlos of the Bourbons of Spain, Sardinia got Novara and Tortona at the expense of the duchy of Milan, which went to Austria, together with Mantua, Parma, and Piacenza. Moreover, the grand-duchy of Tuscany was given to Francis of Lorraine, son-in-law to the Austrian emperor. In 1748 the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, stipulated at the close of the war of the Austrian Succession, modified these partitions only as regarded Parma and Piacenza, awarded to Don Philip, brother to the king of the Two Sicilies, while the duchy of Modena and the republic of Genoa were placed under the protection of the King of France, to whom Genoa afterwards ceded Corsica in 1768. The invasion of I. by the French Republican armies, and the great victories of Napoleon Buonaparte, forced the Emperor Francis II. to sign the treaty of Campo Formio in 1797, by which Austria was given the Venetian territories E. and N. of the Adige, while the remaining territory of the Venetian Republic, with the Romagna, Ferrara, Bologna, Modena, Parma, and Lombardy, went to make up the Cisalpine Republic. The rest of I. also was soon parcelled out into republics, such as the Parthenopœan, Tiberine, Cispadane, and Ligurian. On Napoleon becoming emperor of the French, the Cisalpine Republic was in 1805 turned into the kingdom of I., with himself as king, and it was considerably enlarged by the addition of the Ligurian Republic and the Austrian Venetian territory. In 1806 Napoleon made his brother Joseph king of Naples, and in 1809 he gave to his sister Eliza, Tuscany, Lucca, and Piombino. In this same year the Pope was taken prisoner, and what remained of the Papal States occupied by the French. On the overthrow of Napoleon in 1815, the Congress of Vienna made Austria the dominant power in I., with the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom and the Austrian princes Ferdinand III. to Tuscany, Maria Louisa to Parma, and Francis IV. to Modena. The Bourbon princes, Ferdinand II. and Charles Louis, were given the Two Sicilies and Lucca respectively, and Pius VII. reinstalled in the Papal States. Sardinia regained her dominions, to which was added the territory of the old Genoese Republic. The next lasting territorial changes followed on the Franco-Austrian War of 1859, when Sardinia obtained Lombardy from Austria, and, by popular vote, the Romagna, Tuscany, Modena, and Parma. In 1860 came Garibaldi's wonderful expedition into Sicily, resulting in the Two Sicilies, Umbria, and The Marches being brought under the rule of Victor Emmanuel II., declared king of I. in 1861. Death of Cavour, 1861. In the Austro-Prussian war of 1866 I. got Venetia, and finally the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 gave her the opportunity of occupying Rome, which became henceforth the capital, and put an end to the temporal power of the Papacy.

Ivory Coast, coast region in W. Africa, forming part of Upper Guinea. The I. C. extends from Cape Three Points to Cape Palmas. It is a monotonous tract of land, the eastern parts of which are flat and full of lagoons, the most important being that of Grand Bassam. W. of this lagoon the last offshoots of the plateaux of the interior approach the coast, and the country gradually rises in the direction of Cape Palmas, the highest elevations being Mount Oval (1300 ft.) and the St. André Hills (900 ft.). It has been proved by Captain Binger's recent explorations that the rivers of the I. C., viz., the Komoe, Agniby, and Lahu, are much larger, and take their rise much farther in the interior than was assumed before. Parts of this coast belong to France, Great Britain (Gold Coast col.), and Liberia. A number of trading factories exist, but the moist and oppressively hot climate is very unhealthy to Europeans. Ivory, which was in former times plentiful, is now scarce. [H. G. S.]

Jalut, or more properly Jalut, atoll in the Marshall group, Pacific, crossed in the middle by 6° N. and 169° 33′ E., measuring 38 m. NNW. to SSE., by 22 m. E. to W.; the island of J. in the SE. angle, with the headquarters of a German company trading with the Marshall Is. and neighbouring groups. See Petermann's Mitteil., 1893, p. 238, and plate 17.

Jamaica (Indian Xaimaca, 'island of springs'), one of the Great Antilles, and the principal of the Brit. W. India Is., in the Caribbean Sea, between 17° 43′–18° 32′ N., 76° 11′–78° 21′ W., about 100 m. S. Cuba; length, 144 m.; average breadth, 30 m. Surface mountainous, especially in the E., where the Blue Mountains rise to 7423 ft.; plains occur only in the S. and W. The N. and E. coasts are consequently bold and abrupt, ascending gradually from the shore to 1000 ft. at a short distance inland; whilst the S. is more frequently low W. of Kingston, and is more irregular in outline, comprising some fine bays. There are many excellent ports and harbours all round the island. The rivers are numerous, and generally have a very rapid current; only the Black R. is navigable, and that only by small craft for about 30 m.; valleys are verdant and picturesque. The island is composed to a great extent of white and yellow limestone, with patches of metamorphosed and trappean rocks and conglomerate. The mineral deposits are not important, though copper, iron, and lead are widely distributed in small quantities; there are many mineral and medicinal springs, both hot and cold. The climate is said to be superior to that of any other of the W. Indian Is., permitting of an open-air life at all times; the hottest days and nights in the lowlands, except during the rainy seasons in April and May, and September and October, being tempered by sea and land breezes. In the mountains the temperature varies according to the altitude and exposure to the N. winds. Humidity is scarcely felt in the lowlands, and fogs are never seen along the S. coast. Most of the staple products of tropical countries are raised; and the botanic gardens at Castleton (alt. 600 ft.), 19 m. (15 m. N. by W. direct) from Kingston, are used for introducing and establishing new species and varieties of economic plants. The cinchona was introduced in 1866, and now over 5000 acres are in cultivation, which, at elevations above 5000 ft., grows and thrives in a thoroughly satisfactory manner; tea has recently been introduced. The chief export products are fruit (principally bananas and oranges), sugar, rum, coffee, spices, coco-nuts and dye-woods, 37 per cent. of which in value are exported to England and about one-half to the United States, the trade with which, and above all the fruit trade, has grown very rapidly in recent years. Maize, Guinea corn and rice are the chief grains raised. Cattle and horse rearing are important industries on the N. slopes of the island, where the nutritious grass affords excellent pasture all the year round. Fish are abundant on all parts of the coast. Value of exports and imports (consisting mainly of food stuffs and clothing) are nearly equal, each amounting to about £1,400,000. Revenue and expenditure nearly £600,000. Owing to the character of the country, railways (about 68 m.) are confined to the S. part of the island, and communication is carried on by road conveyances and mules and pack-horses. The government is administered by a Governor appointed by the Crown, assisted by a Legislative Council composed of nominated and elected members, the latter having the majority. The island is divided into three counties, Surrey in the E., Middlesex central, and Cornwall in the W., subdivided into fourteen parishes. There is no ecclesiastical establishment in J., and the population is almost equally divided between the adherents of the Church of England, Baptists, and Wesleyans. There is a government training-college for males and another for females, each of which is strictly undenominational; and several endowed schools, where free education may be obtained. Next to Kingston, the cap. of the colony, Spanish Town, the former cap., is the principal town. J. was discovered by Columbus in 1494, colonised by Spain in 1510, and taken by the English in 1655, in whose possession it has ever since continued. Area, 4193 sq. m. P. (1881) 580,800, of whom little over 14,000 are whites.

Japan, an insular empire in the E. of Asia, the main islands of which extend from 45½° N. to 26° 59′ S., and are separated from the mainland of Asia by the Sea of Japan, the northernmost of these main islands, Yezo, separated from Sakhalin by La Perouse Strait, the southernmost, Kiushiu, from the S. end of Korea by the Strait of Korea. Besides the main islands, however, the empire includes also in the N. the Kurile Is. (Japanese, Chishima), extending to 50° 56′ N.; and in the S. the Bonin Is., extending to 27½° N., and the Liu-kiu Is., extending to 24° 6′ N. The area, pop., &c., of the group are shown in the table below, the mere inspection of which shows that Yezo (q.v.), with its insignificant pop., must be considered apart from the other main islands, and that the great bulk of the pop. is found to the S. of the parallel of 37°, that is, in a lower latitude than Granada or Syracuse in Europe. The name of Nippon, or Niphon, now used even in official publications as one of the names of the main island, is properly that of the whole empire.

[1] The provs. (ken) wholly or mainly S. of 37° N., and E. of 136° E., the limits of the region nearly coinciding with the parallel and meridian named.

Outline.—All the islands are greatly indented, more especially in the S. The main island stretches first S. from about 41½° N., and then turns W., terminating in two peninsulas, the form of which may be likened to the forefinger with the thumb placed under it. These peninsulas form respectively the N. and E. sides of a parallelogram, the S. side of which is formed by the isl. of Shikoku, and the W. by the NE. coast of that of Kiushiu. The enclosed area, a beautiful expanse of sea studded with countless islands, is known as the Inland Sea, access to which is had from the Pacific by the Bungo and Kii Channels, respectively W. and E. of Shikoku, and from the Sea of Japan by the Strait of Shimonoseki to the N. of Kiushiu. Apart from the Inland Sea, the principal bays of the main island are Owari or Isenomi, Suruga, Sagami, Tokyo, and Sendai on the S. and E. coasts, Aomori on the N. coast, and Fuseno or Toyama on the NW. coast (southern half of the island).

Surface.—All the islands are mountainous and volcanic. According to Naumann, the essential feature in the structure of the main island is a band of crystalline slates running near the outer or Pacific side with remarkable continuity from the SW. of Kiushiu through the S. of Shikoku and the S. of Honshiu to about 138° E., where the band trends northwards and terminates, or at least becomes interrupted, about the middle of the island. In the N. half of the island the band reappears in various places, though with less continuity, and in Yezo it is again a marked feature. Outside of this band eruptive rocks are comparatively scanty, and the rocks associated with it W. of the interruption referred to are mainly stratified deposits of Palæozoic and Mesozoic age, whereas inside of it eruptive rocks of various age abound. The break in the continuity of the crystalline slates occurring about 138° E. forms a well-marked feature of Honshiu, both geologically and orographically. According to Naumann, there here occurs a huge transversal cleft or fissure, which he designates the Fossa magna, beginning in the N. in 138° E., nearly opposite the isl. of Sado, and crossing the island in a SSE. direction towards the peninsula between the Suruga and Sagami Bays, opposite the string of islands known as the Izu-nu-Shichito. In this fissure we have only Kainozoic deposits, surmounted by great volcanic masses mainly of recent age, and including Fujino-yama, the highest mountain in Japan (12,425 ft.). Were it not for these volcanic outpourings there would here be a great relative depression in the surface, and in fact the passes in this region are exceptionally easy. Besides Fujino-yama, however, lofty peaks occur both within the fossa and on its margin, especially in that part where the crystalline slates and the associated rocks to the SW. of the fossa trend northwards. (As to the geotectonic significance of this fossa, see Naumann in Proc. R. G. S., 1877; and Ergänzungsheft, No. 108 to Petermann's Mitteil.). There are at least twenty peaks of 8000 ft. in alt. in Japan, four (Fuji, Shirane-zan, Yariga-take, and Akaishi-yama) above 10,000 ft., and all three occur in central Honshiu, in the parallelogram enclosed by the parallels of 34°–38° N., and the meridians of 136°–140° E. According to Milne, the number of mountains easily recognisable as volcanoes in J. is 129, the number that have undergone eruption within historical times at least 100, and 51 still active in the sense of giving off steam. (See Trans. Seismological Soc. of J., vol. ix., Part II.) J. is one of the parts of the world in which both volcanic eruptions and earthquake shocks, gentle and violent, are most frequent. Hot springs, as is natural, are numerous. The difficulty of the passes in J. generally is out of proportion to the alt. of the mountains, which is due partly to the original steepness of the volcanic mountains, partly to the depth of the valleys of erosion wrought by the numerous torrential rivers swelled by the excessive summer rains (see below under climate). There is only one place where the main island is yet crossed by a railway (between Owari Bay and Tsuruga, the line passing E. of Lake Biwa). In central J. the railway connection between Tokyo and Takata is still interrupted for about 5½ m. at the (new) Usui Pass (3170 ft.), where a difference of alt. of nearly 2000 ft. occurs in the interval. The rivers of J. are mostly comparatively short, with a rapid fall in their beds, and hence, being abundantly supplied with water, especially in summer, both from rain and melting snow, torrential in their character, and seldom of much use for navigation. On the other hand, they are of immense value in the plains for irrigation. The longest are the Shinano-gawa, flowing N. into the Sea of J. at Niigata, and the Kinu-gawa, flowing S. into Sendai Bay (the latter navigable). The Tone-gawa is important, as watering with one of its arms the plain of Tokyo. The principal lake is Biwa, in the W. of central J., near Kyoto. There are large lagoons near the lower course of the principal arm of the Tone-gawa. Lake Suwa, near the middle of Honshiu, is a considerable lake, drained S. by the Tenryu-gawa into the Pacific. The principal facts brought out by the following table illustrating the climate, are the great range of temperatures and the abundance of the rainfall :—

[1] July.

The great range of temperature is in accordance with the difference generally observed between the E. and W. side of the great northern land masses, but is particularly striking in an insular country and at stations situated on the coast, as most of those in the table are. The mountainous character of the islands, together with their situation, sufficiently account for the abundance of the rainfall. J. being within the monsoon area of Asia the rains are chiefly summer rains, but the prevailing directions of the winds in the summer and winter monsoons respectively are SE. and NW., in accordance with the position of the barometric minima in the two seasons, rather than SW. and NE., as in India. In N. Japan, especially W. of the mountains, the snowfall is enormous, and copious falls of snow are experienced as far S. as Kagoshima, in the S. of Kiushiu, in 31½° N. Agriculture.—The productive surface of J. is greatly limited, not merely by the extent of the mountains incapable of cultivation, but also by the natural difficulties in the way of communication, already referred to. Good roads scarcely exist. During the rainy season almost all roads are nearly impassable. Wheeled vehicles are comparatively rare. Where they do exist, they are generally drawn either by men or oxen. Goods are for the most part carried on the backs of men or oxen. The cost of transport is consequently generally high, and tends to limit the production. Rice, for example, will not bear a carriage to market of more than one hundred miles on the best country roads, or more than twenty-five miles on inferior roads. Hence it happens in some cases that at some distance from the seacoast, where the local market is limited, even good soils remain uncultivated, whereas near the coast even dune-sand, and certainly very poor soil, may be made to bear crops. Less than 30 per cent. of the surface is reckoned as productive, and about 12 per cent. (less than one-eighth) of the entire surface is devoted to agriculture, including pasture. Yezo and the Kuriles being left out of account, about 17 per cent., or one-sixth of the remainder of the surface, is employed in agriculture. About 25 per cent. of that area is under forests (belonging to the state), leaving, after allowing for the area under buildings and otherwise employed, considerably more than half the surface entirely unused. By far the greater part of the agricultural area is under tillage, and by dint of assiduous spade husbandry, and the very careful utilisation of manure (chiefly domestic manure and fish refuse), the small cultivated area is capable of maintaining the dense population indicated in the table. This is chiefly due to the large area suited for rice, which occupies about three-fifths of the entire area under grains of all kinds. The rice-fields are densest round Tokyo Bay, in prov. Ozaka, prov. Fukuoka (NW. of Kiushiu), in the S. of Kiushiu, and in Shikoku (except the prov. of Tokushima). In general the production relatively to area is less than in tropical countries, but in some favoured districts it is very abundant. Near Kyoto, the old capital, it is not uncommon to obtain 70 bushels of rice to the acre as a summer crop from the same land that had produced 40 bushels of wheat to the acre as a winter crop. In favourable years rice takes a high position among the exports. Besides rice, the principal food-crops are wheat, barley, rye, and soya-beans. The produce per acre of such of these grains as are grown in Europe is relatively small, that of wheat, for example, on the average of the ten years 1881–90, only 13⅜ bushels per acre, or less than half the average in the United Kingdom. Mulberries, from which are obtained the principal export product of the empire, silk, are planted in more than three-fourths of the provinces, everywhere in rows, allowing of space for other crops between. Tea, the second export product in value, is grown chiefly between lat. 34° N. and 36° N., that is in the S. of Honshiu; and the lacquer-tree (Rhus vernicifera DC.), that is, the tree that furnishes the material employed in lacquering, one of the most celebrated of old Japanese industries, is cultivated mainly in the northern part of the same island, between 37° and 39° N. Camphor (derived chiefly from the SW. of Japan), which forms one of the more important among the minor exports of J., is also one of the ingredients used in the art, since that substance serves as a diluent for the lacquering material. The Japanese camphor is pinkish in colour, and superior to that of Formosa. In recent years the most important branches of Japanese agriculture have been rapidly extending, no doubt in consequence of the increased facilities for transport. In evidence of this, the following figures (the earlier figures in each case being the earliest obtainable from the Japanese statistical annuaries) will be found of interest:—The area under rice increased from 6279 thousand acres in 1880 to 6735 thousand acres in 1890, that under other crops, wheat, barley, and rye, from 3510 to 4172 thousand acres. The produce of tea (including bancha tea) increased from 45,671 thousand lbs. in 1882 to 57,199 thousand lbs. in 1889, that of raw silk from 4089 to 7304 thousand lbs. between the same dates. Japanese agriculture leaves little room for live-stock, and under this head there has in recent years been no increase. Sheep have only recently been introduced in small numbers experimentally. The number of horses is about a million and a half, that of cattle one million, as against nearly two millions of the former and upwards of ten millions of the latter in the British Isles, which have a rather smaller population. J. is thus altogether without, or very poorly supplied with, some important products. It has no native wool, no milk, butter, or cheese, and a comparatively small supply of leather, which has to be replaced for different purposes by various other materials. The mineral wealth of the empire is great, but needs development. There are only two minerals in which the empire is really rich, but these are the important ones—coal and iron. The coal production is rapidly increasing, especially in Kiushiu (Karatsu on NW. coast, Takashima I. opposite Nagasaki, and Amakusa I. SE. of Nagasaki). On the isl. of Yezo alone the area of coal is two-thirds as much as the area of coal of equal thickness in the British Isles, and a railway has been laid for the purpose of bringing the coal from Poronai, the chief mining centre, to the coast. The total production increased from 496,000 tons in 1877 to upwards of 3,000,000 tons in 1892. The growth of the iron industry is hindered by the fact of there being no coal in the immediate vicinity of the deposits of the ore, which is chiefly found towards the SW. end of Honshiu, on the side next the Sea of J. Charcoal is hence still used in smelting, and the product is consequently dear, though of good quality. In recent years the production of iron has been steadily decreasing, and the total amount produced is under 4000 tons. Among other minerals are copper, mined at Ashio, in central Honshiu, and elsewhere; gold and silver, produced in the isl. of Sado, also in Hyogo ken, and in Iwate ken (N. Honshiu); silver, also with antimony, in Akita ken (N. Honshiu), all these, as well as iron, being derived from state mines. Antimony is also produced near Saijo in Ehime ken (in the N. of the island of Shikoku), in Miyasaki ken (SE. of Kiushiu), and Miye ken (W. of Owari Bay, Honshiu). Tin is not yet mined to any extent, but is said to abound in the SW. and E. of Kiushiu and near the W. end of Honshiu. In recent years the production of sulphur (in the E. of Yezo and elsewhere) and graphite has greatly increased (sulphur from 3834 thousand lbs. in 1879 to 45,700 thousand lbs. in 1890, graphite from 24 thousand to 10,098 thousand lbs. in the same period). Abundance of kaolin furnishes the raw material for the ancient and celebrated porcelain industry of the country. In all departments of Japanese industry, human labour is assisted only by the most primitive tools and appliances. In agriculture, even the plough is rarely used. The deep and careful tillage of the ground is effected by means of the spade and other hand implements; and where the plough is used, it is an implement that merely scratches the surface, and is incapable of making anything like a furrow. No carts are used in farming, not even the Chinese barrow. Everything is carried. A primitive hand-mill is the only apparatus used for grinding flour. Flour is.

indeed, not much used. Bread was unknown till it was introduced by the Portuguese, and even yet is made only to a very limited extent in the form of cakes. All kinds of manufacturing industries were till recently almost entirely domestic, as they still are mainly, some kind of handicraft being practised in nearly every Japanese household. Great changes are, however, being brought about in consequence of a change in the attitude of the Japanese government towards the civilised nations of the West. Down to about 1868 the Japanese government was as averse to intercourse with European nations as that of China; but at that date a great change took place in the government of the empire, and the authorities that have since controlled the state have shown themselves eager to place the nation abreast of Europe and America in science and the arts. In consequence of this, the modern methods of transport and production are being rapidly introduced. The first railway, from Tokyo to Yokohama, was opened in June 1872. In 1892 a railway already ran along nearly the whole length of the main island on the E. side. From Tokyo, the capital, it proceeds SW. by Nagoya and Kyoto (the old capital) to the ports of Ozaka and Kobe, and thence onwards near the coast. The first native steamship company was established in 1874. The capacity of Japanese merchant vessels of European type increased from 49,845 to 88,816 tons between 1884 and 1889, that of those of Japanese type from 2,799,000 to 3,216,000 koku. Machine cotton-spinning factories have been established with great success. At the beginning of 1888, the number of spindles in these factories (including those not yet working) was under 200,000; in June 1892, the number actually at work was nearly 325,000. The effect that this development must have on the import of cotton-yarn from England and India is obvious. It must be remembered that Japan, like India, has the advantage of producing the raw material, its own production of raw cotton being equal to nearly fifteen-sixteenths of its requirements. Cotton-weaving mills have not been successful; yet, owing to the superior wearing qualities of the productions of the native domestic looms, the import of cotton piece-goods into J. has shown a nearly continuous decline since 1879. In J., as in China, winter garments are mainly padded; but among the upper classes, and even among the richer tradespeople, the use of European woollen garments is coming more and more into favour, and an attempt (hitherto unsuccessful) has been made to establish woollen manufactures with modern machinery in the country. Foreign paper-mills have also been set up; and a striking illustration of the power of J. to compete with Europe in manufacturing industry has been furnished in the match trade. Japanese matches, made by foreign machinery, are now supplanting Swedish in China, and even in Siam and the Straits Settlements. Foreign Commerce.—Silk and tea make up more than three-fifths of the value of the exports of J., and among other important exports are sea-animals and seaweed (both used as food in China), artistic products (earthenware and porcelain, lacquered wares, &c.), coal, rice, copper, camphor. The leading imports are cotton-yarns, woollen and cotton manufactures, sugar, iron-wares, including machinery. Great Britain and India supply most of the cotton-yarns, Great Britain most of the cotton goods, metal, and machinery; China supplies the bulk of the sugar, and Great Britain, France, and Germany most of the woollen goods. Altogether, Great Britain supplies nearly one-half the total value of Japanese imports. The U.S. are the largest market for Japanese silk and tea, and take more than two-fifths of the total exports. China and France are the countries that rank next among those to which the exports of Japan are sent. The most rapidly rising import in recent years have been iron-wares and woollen goods; the most rapidly rising exports, copper ore and unrefined camphor. Restrictions are still placed on the commerce of Japan with foreign countries, and the settlement of foreigners in the empire. At present foreigners are allowed to settle and carry on commerce at the treaty ports of Yokohama, Ozaka, Kobe, Nagasaki, Niigata, and Hakodate, and within a radius of 25 m. round these, where foreign consuls have rights of jurisdiction in matters concerning Europeans. Foreigners may also visit Tokyo and the neighbourhood without a passport, but in the rest of the dominion of J. they are allowed to travel only for health, pleasure, or scientific exploration, and a passport is always required. In 1893, however, a treaty was concluded with Great Britain under which provision was made for a revised customs tariff, on the introduction of which foreigners were to be allowed greater liberty of travel in the country, and for the abolition of consular jurisdiction on the completion of the new civil codes now in preparation, and the establishment of the new tribunals now under organisation, after which the liberty to settle in the country and erect factories anywhere is to be accorded. Emigration and immigration are both scanty. At the end of 1891 there were 32,000 Japanese abroad, of whom 17,700 were in the Sandwich Is. The number of foreign residents in J. at that date was 9550 (including 5344 Chinese, 1708 English, and 967 Americans). The monetary system of J. is on a silver basis. The money of account is the yen, which is also a silver coin, weighing 416 grains Troy, nine-tenths fine (fine weight 374.4 grains), and is divided into 100 sen. Its value has fallen with the price of silver since 1872. (See Appendix, p. 14.) The principal measures of length are the ri = 2.4403 miles, the chō = 5.4229 chains, the jō = 3.3140 yards, this last divided decimally into shaku, sun, and bu; the sq. measures, the sq. ri = 5.9552 sq. m.; the sq. chō (nearly identical with a hectare) = 2.4507 ac., divided into ten tan; the measures of capacity, the koku = 39.7033 gallons or 4.9629 bushels (koku per chō × 2.0251 = bushels per ac.), divided decimally into to, chō, go; the unit of weight for large quantities the kwan = 8.2817 lbs., and for small quantities the momme = 2.1201 drams. The government of J. is a monarchy, which from being absolute (claiming to date from 660 B.C.) became in 1889, by a constitution promulgated on Feb. 11, a limited monarchy. For about 700 years previous to 1868 the power of the emperor was overshadowed by that of a military dignitary known as the shogun, originally appointed in a time of internal troubles, whose office had become practically hereditary in one family. By the revolution of the year named, however, the supreme power was restored into the hands of the emperor, who forthwith removed the cap. from Kyoto, where the emperors had resided since the 8th century, to Yedo, which then received the name of Tokyo, or 'capital of the East.' The feudal system was suppressed in 1871. The executive is vested in the Emperor, generally known in foreign countries by the ancient title of Mikado (assisted and advised by cabinet ministers, responsible to, and appointed by, himself), who also exercises the legislative power with the consent of the Imperial Diet. This body consists of two houses, a House of Peers and a House of Representatives. Both houses may respectively initiate projects of law, make representations to the government, or present addresses to the Emperor. The House of Peers numbers about 300 members, the House of Representatives 300 (fixed number). The former house consists of male members of the Imperial family above 20 years of age, princes and marquises above 25 years, persons above 30 years nominated by the Emperor for state services or erudition, these three classes having life membership; also nobles of lesser degree, and considerable landowners, elected either by their respective orders or classes, and nominated by the Emperor, whose membership is for seven years. Voters must be male Japanese, over 25 years of age, having fixed actual residence in the fu or ken (see below) for not less than a year, and paying direct national taxes of more than 15 yen for one year, and income-tax for three years. All members receive payment and travelling expenses, which may not be declined. The Imperial Diet controls finances and the administration of justice, and must assemble yearly. Voting is by secret ballot (scrutin de liste). J. is divided, on the principal of decentralisation and self-government, into three Imperial cities (Tokyo-fu, Kyoto-fu and Ozaka-fu), and forty-two prefectures (ken). The ken are again subdivided into dists. (ku, gun, or kori). Before the Revolution of 1868 the country was divided into 86 provs. (kuni), arranged in groups, the Gokinai or Central Provs., and 9 circuits or do. Members of city and prefectural assemblies are elected, and annually, or every other year, are summoned to the Department of the Interior, to consider questions of local administration. Finance.—Nearly half the revenue is derived from the land-tax, and the remainder chiefly from excise duties (on the manufacture of sake, or rice-beer, and on damaged rice), from government undertakings and custom. Military service is compulsory for all Japanese (over 20 years) for seven years—three of active service, four in the reserve. For five subsequent years they belong to the Landwehr, after which, up to the age of 40, they are numbered in the Landsturm, and can be called to serve in national emergencies. The navy is recruited by conscription and voluntary enlistment—for the former three years' active and three years' reserve service; for the latter eight years' active and four years' reserve. Japan is divided into five naval districts, each with an office of commander-in-chief, but at present only three such offices are actually established (at Yokosuka, Kure, and Sasebo). There is no state religion, absolute freedom of belief and practice being secured (by the new constitution) as long as compatible with peace and order. The chief forms are Shintoism (the principal temples maintained by state or local authorities) and Buddhism. Elementary education is compulsory. The university (with colleges of Law, Science, Medicine, Literature, and Engineering) is supported by government, as are the bulk of both the elementary and higher schools; these latter also by local rates. At the end of 1891 there were six towns (Tokyo, Ozaka, Kyoto, Nagoya, Kobe, and Yokohama) with more than 100,000 inhabitants, eleven (Kanazawa, Hiroshima, Sendai, Tokushima, Toyama, Nagasaki, Kagoshima, Wakayama, Hakodate, Kumamoto, and Fukuoka) with from 50,000 to 100,000 inhabitants, and seventeen with from 30,000 to 50,000. By the treaty of Shinonoseki, ratified at Pekin in May 1895, which concluded the Korean war [Korea], China ceded to J. Formosa and the Pescadore Is., as well as the Liautung Penin. in Manchuria, but J. is reported to have agreed to restore this last terr. China also agreed to open to foreign trade several additional ports, those suggested in the treaty being Kingchou and Shashi in Hupe, Chungking in Süchwan, Suchou in Kiangsu, and Hangchow in Chekiang.

Japan, Sea of, an inland sea, on the E. of Asia, situated between 35 and 46° N., 128° and 142° E., bounded by the islands of Japan on the E., Russian Manchuria and the penin. of Korea on the W. It communicates with the Pacific by Tsugaru Strait, by the channel of Korea with the East China Sea, and with the Sea of Okhotsk by the Strait of La Pérouse and the Gulf of Tartary. All these straits are under 100 fathoms in depth.

Jauru, fort, Brazil, state of and 120 m. ESE. of Mato Grosso.

Java, the most valuable possession of Holland in the E. Indies, is a long narrow island between the Java Sea on the N. and the Indian Ocean on the S., measuring 650 m. from E. to W., and 45 to 130 m. from N. to S., its extremities lying in 5° 52′ and 8° 50′ S. lat., and 105° 13′ and 114° 39′ E. long. Including Madura, an adjacent island that is administratively associated with J., the area is a little more than one-half, but the pop. nearly two-thirds, that of Great Britain. The S. coast is tolerably regular, but inaccessible owing to the fierce surge that beats upon its flat sands and beetling limestone cliffs; the N. shores are more irregularly low, and afford safe anchorage in the bays of Bantam, Batavia, Samarang, and Surabaya. The backbone of the island is a chain of Cretaceous mountains, with numerous (45) active volcanoes—Smeru, Ravun, Arjuno, Lavu, Sumbing, Guntur, Galunggung, Merapi, Lamongan—reaching 10,000 to 12,000 ft. Volcanic outbreaks are by no means uncommon, and by the débris they discharge help to make the extraordinarily fertile plains of J. The rivers are nearly all short, and of comparatively little use for navigation. The greater portion of the island belongs to the Tertiary age, but has in many parts been greatly transformed by volcanic agencies. The climate is hot and moist, and frequently unhealthy in the low-lying districts, but cooler in the higher regions inland. The heat is, however, tempered everywhere by regular land and sea breezes. The temperature (18 years) is pretty uniform: Jan. 77.5° F., July 78.1°, year 78.6°; rainfall, 73 in.; the rainy season (west monsoon) lasts from November to March. Flora and fauna.—It is estimated that one-fifth of the total surface is covered with virgin forest, the teak forests alone occupying 2300 sq. m. The vegetation is preponderatingly tropical, and embraces Araceæ, Mesembriaceæ, Amaranthaceæ, Euphorbiaceæ, Leguminosæ, Melastomaceæ, Loranthaceæ, Rubiaceæ, Casuarina; mangroves, cocoa-nuts, palms, banyans, bamboos, luxuriant grasses, ferns, pitcher-plants, orchids, creepers, spices, mosses; and the cultivated plants. The principal representatives of the animal kingdom are the tiger, leopard, rhinoceros, wild pig, deer, wild cat, wild dog, flying-fox, lemuroids, monkeys, porcupine, leech, turtle, snakes, crocodile; with swarms of birds, insects, molluscs. Agriculture.—The extremely fertile soil produces rice and maize, the chief food of the natives; and sugar, coffee, indigo, tea, cinchona, and tobacco for export. Until the year 1870 these products were grown by the natives, under a system of forced labour, exclusively for the government; but after 1890 coffee was the only commodity cultivated in that way. Sugar (300,000 to more than 400,000 tons annually) is cultivated principally in Middle J.; coffee (5400 tons) and tobacco (9400 tons) in East J.; cinchona (2300 tons) and tea (8,000,000 lbs.) in West J. The bulk of the people are engaged in cultivating the soil; their wealth consists mostly in buffaloes, cattle, and horses. The teak forests belong to the government. Some 500,000 cubic ft. of timber of all kinds is felled every year. Salt, a government monopoly, bringing in £600,000 to £700,000 annually, is the only mineral worked, though coal exists. Gold, formerly plentiful, is now of little account. Fish are extensively taken on the coasts, and are a common article of diet. The native industries go little beyond the making of native cloth and mats, Chinese work, rice-husking, and indigo mills. Ice factories, mineral-water works, printing works, distilleries, soap factories, indicate the scope of European manufacturing enterprise. Communication.—The island is threaded by good roads, along which goods are drawn in buffalo-carts; by nearly 1000 m. of railway, besides 120 m. of steam tramways; and by a good network of telegraph lines. Lines of steamships connect J. pretty frequently with Holland, England, France, China, and Australia; and there is cable connection with both Europe and Australia. The ports of J., especially Batavia, serve as the commercial emporia of the E. Indies. Sugar is exported to the value of between 4 and 6 millions sterling annually, coffee to between 1½ and 2¾ millions. Other valuable commodities are tobacco, indigo, tea, cinchona, pepper and other spices, rice, (though J. does not produce sufficient for the wants of the people), and tin, which is first imported from Banca and Billiton. The aggregate exports average 10⅛ millions sterling, the imports 8⅝ millions. Textiles and haberdashery (2–3 millions), provisions, petroleum (£600,000), coals, spirits and wine, machinery, pottery, and metals account for the bulk of the imports. The countries principally traded with are Holland, the Straits Settlements (Singapore and Pulo Penang), England (1–2 millions sterling for sugar), and the United States. The harbours of Batavia, with Tanjong Priok, Samarang, and Surabaya, are entered by 3000 or more vessels of 4 million tons burden in the year. The money, weights, and measures are the same as those of Holland; but the picul (=133⅓ lb. avoir.) and the catty (=1⅓ lb.) are generally used. Government.—Including Madura, J. is divided into 22 residencies, each administered by a resident, who, whilst subordinate to the governor-general of the Dutch East Indies, exercises almost absolute authority within his province, through European (assistant residents and controleurs) and native (chiefs) inferior officials. Two divisions, however—Surakarta and Jokjakarta, in Middle Java—are ruled by dependent princes. The greater part of the soil belongs to the colonial government, who cultivate large tracts of it by means of native labour (enforced in the coffee plantations), and since 1870 have let large estates to private individuals and public companies. The sale of opium, another government monopoly, gives a revenue of 1½ millions a year. The right to gather edible bird's-nests is also a privilege that has to be purchased from government. The Means of Defence embrace an army of 14,000 Europeans, chiefly Dutch and Germans, and 19,000 natives of J., all voluntarily enlisted; and a fleet of some 40 vessels, manned by 3500 men. The population consists of Javanese, Sudanese, and Madurese, all closely allied divisions of the Malay race; they make up 22½ out of the 23 millions who inhabit the island. P. in 1849 was only 9½ millions all told. Including the European soldiers, the Europeans do not exceed 60,000 in number. The Chinese barely reach a quarter of a million; and there are some 12,000 Arabs amongst the natives. The chewing of the betel-nut is universal, and the smoking of tobacco and opium is very common. There are three native dialects, corresponding to the three typical races; and a curious distinction exists in diction and grammar between the vulgar Javanese and the language used towards the chiefs and higher classes. There is a native literature of considerable antiquity, its principal forms being puppet-plays (wayangs), chronicles, and poetry. Some of these writings are in Old Javanese or Kawi. Every form of religion is permitted, but no proselytism is allowed. The natives profess Islam, often in a corrupt form. Between 1500 and 3000 pilgrims travel to Mecca every year. One or two tribes, e.g., the Baduwis in Bantam, still cleave to heathenism. Of native Christians (Reformed and Roman Catholics) there are not more than 13,000 in all. The government provides both elementary and middle-class schools for Europeans, elementary and normal schools for natives, and four schools for the sons of native chiefs. Some of the private schools for natives receive government subventions. Cap. Batavia; but the governor retires to Buitenzorg, on the highlands, inland, in the unhealthier portion of the year. Other towns have been already mentioned. The earliest authentic history of J. begins with the 5th century. During the 8th and 9th centuries Hindu influences were particularly strong, as is partly evidenced by the magnificent temple ruins at Boro-Budur and other places; but even earlier the people of the island had developed a high civilisation. Mohammedanism invaded J. about a century before the Dutch began to settle themselves there, in 1610. They have ruled the entire island only since 1830. The English held possession of J. from 1811 to 1817. See P. J. Veth, Java (in German), 3 vols., 1875–78, where are maps; A. R. Wallace, Malay Archipelago (1869); E. Metzger, in Scot. Geog. Mag., 1888. [J. T. B.]

R., with ruins of a fine abbey founded by David in 1118. The royal burgh was erected by David I., and the last charter is by Mary in 1556. The woollen industry (first of all spinning) was introduced here in the first half of the 18th century, and has been carried on ever since; principal products, tweeds and blankets. There are also engineering works and other factories. Market-day, Tu. Mean rfall. (Sunnyside, alt. 350 ft., 1866–80), 26.7 in. Royal burgh, P. (1891) <2500; par. 22,535 ac., P. <5000; tn. P. <3500.

Jedda, or Jidda, seapt. of Arabia, on the Red Sea, 60 m. W. Mecca, of which it is the port. The mother-of-pearl industry, which was formerly of considerable note, has of late years very much decreased. Its exports have also greatly fallen off, and the place is now of little importance, except as a landing-place for pilgrims, many thousands of whom arrive here annually. The harbour is the best in the Red Sea, and ships can lie in safety in any weather (1½ m. out, in 9½–18 fathoms, loading and discharging by lighters), but the entrance is difficult. It was bombarded by the British in 1858. The vicinity of the town is a bare desert. Mean temp. (6 yrs., 1881–86), yr. 79.0° F., Feb. 69.3°, Aug. 86.5°. P. about 20,000.

There are also extensive apple-orchards. Cows of a small but good breed are numerous, and butter is exported. Off the SE. ct. are oyster beds, fished by the islanders. Steamers communicate frequently with Southampton, Weymouth, St. Malo, and Granville. The island is divided into 12 pas., in the diocese of Winchester. It has its own legislature, the 'States' or insular parliament, consisting of the bailiff of the royal court (appointed by the Crown), who is president, the 12 jurats of the royal court, elected for life by the ratepayers, the rectors of the 12 pas., the 12 constables or mayors, elected every three years by the ratepayers, and 14 deputies, also elected every three years; their acts being confirmed or annulled, in special cases, by the viscount or English lieutenant-governor. From the decision of its royal court (the only tribunal in the island) appeal lies only to the sovereign in council. The military governor has under him usually about 500 regular troops, besides which Jersey has a militia of 2500 men, with an artillery battalion, all males between the ages of 16 and 65 being bound to render personal service. Its native inhabitants speak a French patois, and preserve many Norman feudal customs, the Channel Is. having formed a part of the Norman dominions, and remained attached to England, since the Conquest. Principal towns, St. Helier (the cap.) and St. Aubin, connected by a railway. Area, 45 sq. m. (28,717 ac.). P. (1831) 36,582; (1881) 52,445; (1891) 54,518 (1212 to the sq. m.).

Jerusalem (Arabic El Kuds, 'the holy'), ancient Hierosolyma, a famous city of western Asia, the cap. of ancient Judæa and modern Palestine, and the scene of the most important events in Scripture history, now comprised in the Turkish pash. of Syria. It stands upon a series of rocky spurs near the summit, and on the edge of the great central tableland which traverses the country from N. to S., in 31° 46′ N., 35° 18′ E., 33 m. distant from the Mediterranean, and 15 m. from the Dead Sea, to which there is a descent of 3870 ft. It is separated from the Mount of Olives on the E. by the valley of Jehoshaphat or the 'brook Kedron,' which unites with the valley of Hinnom, from the W. of the city, on the S., on the N. and NW. the ground rises in rocky acclivities. It is now connected by railway with the port of Jaffa (q.v.), on the Mediterranean. Modern J. is about 2½ m. in circumference, enclosed by walls of hewn stone, covering an area probably equal to that of the city in the time of Hadrian, but before its destruction by Titus it was much larger. The wall, erected or restored in 1534, is crowned by battlements, and makes many angles; height, 36–42 ft., and 4–5½ ft. thick. It has four principal gates, facing the cardinal points: Jaffa on the W., Damascus N., St. Stephen's E., and Zion S. Traces of the ancient wall have been discovered running S. from the present wall, the ancient wall having probably extended southwards from the edge of the escarpment overlooking the valley of Hinnom, nearly 400 yds. S. of the present. Outside the walls on the W. a modern suburb has recently been growing rapidly. In 1893 the first public garden was opened outside the Jaffa gate. The interior of the city has a sombre, melancholy aspect, a labyrinth of narrow, dirty, ill-paved streets or lanes, many with open sewers. The heavy, grey, windowless walls of the houses, each with terraced stone roofs, are relieved by only a few cupolas and minarets. The city is divided into four quarters: 1. The Moslem, in the NE., in which is the Serai or palace, close to the haram, and affording the best view of it. 2. The Christian, in which are the Latin convent, on an elevated point near the NW. angle of the city, the church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Armenian convent, the citadel, and the English church. 3. The Armenian, in the SW. 4. The Jewish, in the SE., the most squalid and filthy of all. The only open space is the haram area (in full, el-haram-esh-sherif, 'the sacred enclosure'), which forms a quarter of itself in the SE. angle of the city, on the top of the ancient Mount Moriah, on which stood the temples of Solomon and Herod, and in which is the so-called mosque of Omar, built not by Omar, who merely fixed the site (the supposed site of the temple of Solomon), but by the tenth caliph Abd-el-Melik towards the close of the 7th century. The noble dome, minarets, and massive walls of this mosque are the pride and ornament of the city. The enclosure in which it stands is considered by the Mohammedans as second in sanctity only to Mecca and Medina, and is jealously guarded. In its centre is 'the Dome of the Rock' (Arabic Kubbet-es-Sakhra), a rough mass of stone covering the summit of Mount Moriah, and the supposed site of the altar of burnt-offering. In the SW. angle of the same area is the Mosk-el-Aksa, supposed to be on the site of the basilica built by the Emperor Justinian in the middle of the 6th century, but the substructures of which are in reality much older. By the Crusaders this edifice was used as a royal palace. A small court adjoining the ancient wall on the S. of the haram is called the 'Jews' wailing place.' Here the Jews have, for centuries, been permitted, on Fridays, to approach the precincts of the temple, and to weep and pray over its desolation. The church of the Holy Sepulchre consisted originally of a group of buildings erected by order of Constantine, A.D. 326, over the reputed site of the tomb of our Lord. It was all but ruined and restored at different times, and the present church dates from 1808. It is divided among many Christian communities, each striving for supremacy, and so neglecting the building that its battered dome threatens to fall in. Near it are the ruins of the hospital of St. John. Besides the Latin convent, there are those of the Greeks, Copts, and Armenians within the walls, and the vast separately walled enclosure of the new Russian convent outside the walls on the NE. The Jews have many synagogues, and near the lower pool of Gihon a large hospital has been erected for his poorer countrymen by Sir Moses Montefiore. Outside the walls, on the N., are the grotto of Jeremiah, the tombs 'of the kings and of the judges,' and beyond, the hill of Scopus; S., near the Zion gate, the huts of the lepers, of whom there are upwards of sixty, the Christian cemetery, the tomb of David, the valley of Hinnom, hill of Evil Council, and remains of Solomon's aqueduct; SE. the mount of Offence, the pool and village of Siloam, and the fountain of the Virgin; E. the valley of Jehoshaphat, or the dry bed of the 'brook Kedron,' on the W. of which is the Mussulman, and on the E. the Jewish cemetery, with the so-called tombs of Jehoshaphat, Absalom, St. James, and Zacharias, the garden of Gethsemane, a small walled enclosure with very ancient olive trees, and the tomb and chapel of the Virgin Mary. Beyond, on the E., the mount of Olives rises steeply to the height of 2665 ft., surmounted by the church of the Ascension; on the W. the valley of Gihon, with the lower and upper pools, and the Turkish cemetery. The climate of J. is humid in winter and arid in summer. Frost is common; several years pass without snow; ice is found occasionally one-eighth of an inch thick. The city is badly supplied with water. The fountain of the Virgin is the only useful spring. Rain is collected in numerous cisterns, and water is conveyed in skins from Solomon's pools, whence it is proposed to bring it by reconstructing the aqueducts. The bazaars are extensive, and well supplied with fruits, fowls, and eggs. The Jews bake very fine bread, and the European shops furnish Western luxuries. Commerce is on a small scale, but there are many cabinetmakers, blacksmiths, goldsmiths, tailors, shoemakers, jewellers, and watchmakers. The city, originally taken from the Jebusites by the Hebrews, under Joshua, about B.C. 1400, was taken and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 598, rebuilt by command of Cyrus, B.C. 586, again taken by Ptolemy Soter, B.C. 324, and subjugated to Egypt, afterwards held by the Maccabees, taken by Pompey, B.C. 63, and held as a Roman city under Herod, who rebuilt the Temple, until its almost total destruction by the troops of Titus, A.D. 70. At this period, in the words of Pliny, it was the most famous city, not only of Palestine, but of the whole East. In A.D. 135 the Jews were finally dispersed, and the city was again rebuilt by Hadrian. On the conversion of Constantine, A.D. 326, it ceased to be a heathen city, and resumed its ancient name. The Empress Helena adorned it with noble churches. It was captured by the Persians in 614, by the Saracens under Omar in 637, in 1099 by the Crusaders under Godfrey of Bouillon, and held by the Christians for 88 years, when it was again captured by the forces of Saladin in 1187, and it has remained under Turkish government ever since, except for a short interval during 1832, when it was taken by the Egyptians under Ibrahim Pasha. It has since 1840 been the see of a Protestant bishop, appointed alternately by the governments of Great Britain and Prussia. Alt. 2382–2581 ft. Mean temp. Johor, or Johore, Malay sultanate, in the extreme S. of the Malay Penin., its southern half extending from the Strait of Malacca to the S. China Sea, its northern portion stretching somewhat in the form of a wedge N. to 3° N., between Malacca and Negri Sembilan on the W., and Pahang on the E.; cap. J. Surface generally low-lying, the mountains, which in most parts form the back-bone of the Malay Penin., here giving place to scattered groups of hills rising from out of flat, and for the most part trackless, and uninhabited jungle, in a large measure swampy and fever-stricken. The most extensive area of hills is the Blumut group towards the S., highest peak about 3000 ft. The highest elevation is that called by the Malays Gunong Ledang (about 4150 ft.), near the NE. frontier of Malacca. It is one of those mountains to which Europeans have given the name of Ophir, on account of the gold found near; but the alluvial gold is now nearly exhausted, and the reefs have not as yet been worked with commercial success. The chief rivers are the Muawr, Indau, Sembrong Indau (r. bk. trib. of the Indau), Batu Pahat, and Johore, the last forming an estuary immediately to the NE. of the isl. of Singapore. The Batu Pahat, which enters the Strait of Malacca, and the Sembrong Indau, issue from the same swamp, about the middle of the terr., and a short cutting at their source would afford a complete navigable channel from the Strait of Malacca to the China Sea (SW. to NE.), which would be important in the NE. monsoon, when the E. coast ports are inaccessible. The chief export products are gambier and pepper, the cultivation of which is by Chinese immigrants, who now form the bulk of the inhabitants. Coffee is also cultivated. Among the other inhabitants besides Malays are the Negrito aborigines [Malay Peninsula], called by the Malays of

J. Jakuns. Within the last few years the state has been rapidly advancing. There is a short railway from the port of Bandar Maharani on the W. coast to important plantations in a fertile dist. to the SE., and a line is projected from the town of J. running NW. through nearly the whole length of the terr. Area about 7500 sq. m. P. estimated at 300,000; Chinese, 210,000; Malays, 50,000. See Geog. Jour., iii. p. 281.

Johor, or Johor Baru, tn., cap. of the state of J., on the S. ct., opposite the middle of the isl. of Singapore; a free port; in 1866 a place composed of only a few huts, now (1894) a town with about 15,000 inhabitants.

Jordan, post-vil., Canada, Ontario, Lincoln co., 28 m. ESE. Hamilton, on an inlet of Lake Ontario. P. <1500.

Jordan, 'the river of Palestine,' rises from springs on the W. flank of Mt. Hermon; its farthest source is near Râsheyyá, 3500 ft. above the sea; the most copious springs are at Banias and Dan; besides these, it is fed by many streams in its upper course. It flows southward parallel with the Mediterranean 50 m. to the Bahr-el-Huleh (Waters of Merom). Hence it rushes to near the Lake of Galilee or Tiberias 11 m., with a fall of 690 ft., but it enters the lake a slow, turbid stream 70 ft. wide. From its exit at the S. of this lake, which is 683 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean, it descends rapidly due S. to the Dead Sea down an inclined plane (wholly below the level of the Mediterranean), broken by 27 large and many smaller rapids, at the rate of 10 ft. in a mile (direct 3 ft. in river's course), and with a course so tortuous that in a direct distance of 60 m. the length of the river is 200 m. From its rapid fall it derives the name of the 'Descender.' In its upper course it is pure and limpid, but below it is turbid and muddy; it varies in width from 20–100 yards, and in depth from 3–7 ft. There are now no bridges between the two lakes, but remains of many; and its only tribs. of importance, in that space, are the Yarmuk (Hieromax) and the Zerka (Jabbok), the former of which enters with a slow current 40 yards wide. With the exception of one or two small villages near the base of the mountains, there are no permanent settlements in the valley S. of 32° 40′ N. (about 3 m. S. of the Lake of Tiberias). The fords of J., annually visited by pilgrims at Easter, the supposed place of John's baptism, are a few miles above its mouth in the Dead Sea. Total length of the J., including Lakes Merom and Tiberias, about 135 m., direct distance. The scenery of the river is neither bold nor picturesque, it has no fishery, and has never been navigable; its great distinction is its bounding the Holy Land. On the E. it is walled in by the mountains of Moab. The J. is subject to two annual freshets; one during the rainy season (November to March), the other when the Lebanon snow melts, by which operation whole tracts are irrigated and the land fertilised. The valley of the J., one of the most remarkable fissures in the globe, extends, in its widest sense, from the mountains near the Orontes on the N. to the Gulf of Akabah on the S.; it is, however, matter of dispute whether the river ever flowed along the intervening 120 m. beyond the Dead Sea to the Red Sea. From the Dead Sea to the water-parting there is now a rise of 3270 ft.

Jumna, the Jomanes of Pliny, riv., India, rises on the S. slope of the Himalaya Mts., in 31° 3′ N., 78° 30′ E. It flows S. as far as 28° N., forming the boundary between the Punjab and the NW. Provs., then SE. through the latter, and joins the Ganges 3 m. below Allahábád, enclosing with that river the terr. called the Doáb. Its source is 10,849 ft. above sea-level, 16 m. lower the alt. of the river is only 5036 ft., and where it debouches on the plains (100 m.) 1276 ft. Here it has become a large river, but shortly after its water is almost entirely taken off by the Eastern and Western Jumna canals (q.v.). Below Agra it receives numerous affluents, and is navigated by clumsy barges, but the traffic is not considerable. Principal tribs. are the Chambal, Sind, Betwa, and Ken on the right, and on the left the Sengur and Rind. The cities Delhi, Agra, and Allahábád, and the towns Muttra and Etawah, are on its banks. Length, 860 m.; area of basin, 118,000 sq. m.; flood discharge, 1,333,000 cubic ft. per second.

Jura, frontier dep., eastern France, bounded on the N. by Haute-Saône, and formed out of Franche-Comté; divided into four arrs.: Lons-le-Saunier (cap.), Dôle, Poligny, and Saint-Claude. The dep. has three natural divisions: the mountain, or region of the Jura, consisting of seven chains of Jurassic limestone running NE. to SW. parallel to each other, with their highest points (Crêt-Pela, 4910 ft.; Noirmont, 5085 ft.) near the Swiss frontier; the vine region, or Coteau, the richest part of the dep., lying between the foot of the Jura and the boundary riv. Ognon; the plain is of small extent. With the exception of the area drained by the Orbe, which enters Switzerland shortly after feeding the Lac des Rousses, the whole dep. belongs to the Rhone basin (to which it contributes through the Valserine, Ain, and Saône). Climate very cold in the mountainous portion, fairly temperate in the plain. Principal cereal wheat, which, however, covers less than $\frac{1}{10}$ of the surface. Oats and maize also grown to a considerable extent. The vine occupies more than 4 per cent. of the surface, but the relative production of wine is less than half the average of France. Among the aromatic and medical mountain plants may be named the vulnerary, called Swiss tea. The forests include that of Chaux, one of the largest in France, and those of Moisdons, Joux, and Serre. The most important mineral product is rock-salt, notably from Montmorot, near Lons-le-Saunier, Salins, and Grozon. The production of iron ore, formerly considerable, is now insignificant. Among the principal industries are lapidary work, fancy turnery, watch and clock making, and at Salins and other cantons of the Jura Gruyère cheese-making. Area, 1951 sq. m. P. 273,000.

Jura, range of mts. stretching from SW. to NE. for about 190 m. between the Rhone and Rhine, chiefly on the borders of France and Switzd. They are chiefly composed of light-coloured limestones, in great measure belonging to the geological system which has received the name of Jurassic in consequence of their extensive development in these mountains. The Jurassic rocks, however, predominate chiefly on the outer or French side of the mountains, the rocks on the Swiss side being mainly of more recent (Cretaceous and Eocene) age, with long inliers of Jurassic date. In the S. the rocks of the J. are not geologically distinct from those of the adjoining Alps; but the Rhone valley is a sufficiently well-marked feature to be taken as an orographical limit; and the same may be said of the Rhine valley in the N., especially since the mountains on opposite sides of the river here present a marked contrast in topographical features. The chains of which the J. mountains are composed are for the most part parallel to the general trend of the range, and separated from one another by longitudinal valleys (one of which contains the important towns of Le Locle and La Chaux de Fonds, at the height of more than 3000 ft.), corresponding to the undulations in the strata of which they are composed. The steep slope throughout is on the inner or Swiss side, where the Lakes of Geneva (W. end), Neuchâtel, and Bienne lie at their base. Parallel chains are met with in France only in the southern portion of the system (from about Pontarlier southwards), which also contains the highest elevations—Cret de la Neige (5655 ft.), Colombier de Gex (5550 ft.), La Dôle (5505 ft.), both the last W. of the Lake Geneva, Mt. Tendre (5515 ft.), to the E. of the Vallée de Joux, Chasseron (5290 ft.) W. of Lake Neuchâtel. Further N. the highest peak is Chasseral (5280 ft.), W. of the Lake of Bienne. In France the northern part of the range takes the form of broad plateaux, and in this part of the system a series of ridges can be made out running E. and W. for nearly 100 m. about the parallel of 47° 20′, beginning in the W. with the Montagnes du Lomont, and continued in Switzd. by the Mont Terrible. Like all limestone ranges the Jura are intersected by numerous precipitous clefts and cracks, in which the surface water to a large extent disappears, to continue its course underground. This fissured character of the mountains, as well as the numerous parallel ranges, present great obstacles to communication, especially in the S. Costly works have been required in railway construction. W. of Geneva the railway pierces the Grand Crédo (more properly Crêt d'Eau) in a tunnel before it bificurates to follow the different routes to Lyons and Macon respectively. N. of this there is no other railway-crossing till we come to the Col de Jougne (50 m. distant in a direct line), by which the railway crosses from Pontarlier to Lausanne. Intermediate between these points, however, is the old pass-road from the valley of the Doubs to Geneva by the Col de la Faucille (4340 ft.), with a branch to Nyon by the Col de Saint Cergues (4145 ft.). From Pontarlier to Neuchâtel the railway running NE. makes use of the Val Travers, in which it passes through several short tunnels. The devious and costly line from Besançon to Le Locle and La Chaux de Fonds traverses the Chaumont ridge in a tunnel, and afterwards in crossing the Swiss frontier the defile known as the passage of Les Brenets. Further N. there are important tunnels through the Hauenstein for the line between Liestal and Olten, and through the Homberg for that running W. from Brugg. The N. portion of the Swiss J. are well wooded, but in the S. the forests are smaller and more scattered, and the plateaux of the N. section of the French J. are for the most part bare. Besides agriculture and the rearing of live stock, watchmaking is an important industry [Switzerland, Besançon.]

Jura, German. This name may be applied to the ranges which go by the name of the Jura NE. of the Rhine, namely, the series of heights composed of Jurassic rocks continuing the outer Jura SW. of the Rhine, and which are generally regarded as forming two divisions, the Swabian J. extending from the Rhine to the Wörnitz (where the railway from Nördlingen to Donauwörth now runs), and the Franconian J., beyond that limit. The Swabian J. is geologically distinct from the part of the Swiss J. immediately to the S. (which is of Tertiary age), and consists mostly of a broad tableland 2300–2700 ft. in height, with its steepest slope on the W. side, and that not rectilineal like the steep slope of the J. proper, but winding out and in with numerous curves. It lies chiefly to the NW. of and parallel to the upper Danube in the SE. of Baden, in Hohenzollern, Würtemberg, and the W. of Bavaria. The broader and larger portion SW. of the line of valleys followed by the Stuttgart-Ulm railway is known as the Rauhe Alb (or less properly Alp), and is uncrossed by any railway between its NE. limit and the line from Balingen to Sigmaringen. The term Rauhe ('rough' or 'rude') is applicable, both in virtue of the sterility of its soil and the bleakness of its climate. The small section NE. of the Rauhe Alb, limited eastward by the Kocher and Brenz valleys (Aalen-Heidenheim-Ulm railway), is called the Albuch, and the remaining small section the Härtfeld, which is separated on the N. from the Franconian heights (Frankenhöhe) by the Jagst valley. The Franconian J., running first E. and then N. through the middle of N. Bavaria, is rather a tract of hilly country than a range of hills or mountains.

Jura, the ancient Diura, isl., Scot., Argyllshire, Inner Hebrides, immediately NE. Islay, and S. of Scarba, from which it is separated by the Gulf of Corryvreckan. Length, NE. to SW., 24 m.; breadth varies from 2 to 8 m. Surface mountainous, and it is the most rugged of the Hebrides; in the S. are three peaks, termed the 'Paps of Jura' (respectively 2571 ft., 2477 ft., and 2407 ft.). On the E. and most populous coast towards the S. end is the bay of Small Isles, on which stands the principal village, with the parish church; on the W. is the deep inlet Loch Tarbet. Principal products oats, barley, potatoes, and slate. Area of island about 54,000 ac., only 500 of which are arable. With the adjacent isls. of Balnahua, Garvelloch, Lunga, Pladda, Scarba, and Skervuile it forms a par. Par. 93,799 ac., P.<750; isl. P. 619.

Everywhere fordable above the city of K.; descended by rafts of inflated skins from Jalálábád (above which it is of no use except for irrigation); navigable for boats of 40–50 tons from Dúobandi 40 m. above its mouth.

Kábul, Cabool, or Cabul, city, Afghanistan, on the Kabul R., 5800 ft. above the sea, and 82 m. NNE. Ghazni, 190 m. by carriage road from Pesháwar. Lat. 34° 30′ N., long. 69° 18′ E. It is enclosed on the NW. and S. sides by hills, along which run weak ramparts. It was formerly walled, and at its E. end is the citadel called the Bála Hissár ('palace of the kings'). Streets high, built of sun-dried bricks and wood, with flat roofs; those intricate and badly paved. Houses in general two or three stories of the wealthy have extensive courts and gardens. It is abundantly supplied with water, generally of good quality. Outside the city are the tombs of the Emperor Bábar, who made K. his cap., and of Timur-Shah. From its elevation, the winter in K. is long and severe; the summer is delightful; average temp. from 75° to 85° F. Just outside of the city are large engineering works, with a rolling-mill and steam-hammer, and including a rifle and cartridge factory, and plant for electric lighting, established by the Amir Abdur-Rahman. A railway is being laid thence to a marble quarry about 10 m. distant. The inhabitants are tall, well made, not very dark, and have Jewish features. They are Mohammedans of the Sunni sect. The higher classes speak Persian, the common people the Pushtu dialect. K. was taken by Subuktigin in 977, by Tamerlane at the end of the 14th century, and in 1738 by Nadir Shah. It was the scene in 1842 of the treacherous outbreak of the chiefs, the murders of Sir W. Macnaughten and Sir A. Burnes, and the massacre of 3800 soldiers and 12,000 camp followers; was retaken in the same year by the British troops under Sir R. Sale, the bazaars and public buildings burned and finally relinquished. On the 3rd of September 1879 Sir L. Cavagnari (the British resident appointed under the treaty of Gandamak in the previous May) and his escort were murdered in an outbreak of the populace and Afghan troops, and on the 9th of October following the city was taken by General Roberts, and remained in British occupation for a year. Káfiristán ('Land of the Infidels'), a country of central Asia, between 34° 20′ and 36° N., 69° 40′ and 71° 40′ E., enclosed by Afghanistan, Kunduz, Badakshan, Chitral, and Swat. It comprises a part of the S. declivity of the Hindu Kush, and is traversed by affluents of the Kabul R. Its narrow but fertile valleys produce an abundance of fruits, including wild grapes and pomegranates, along with splendid horse-chestnuts and other foliage trees. At somewhat higher elevations (about 5000–8000 or 9000 ft.) dense pine and cedar forests abound. Above 13,000 ft. there is no vegetation of any kind except rough grasses and mosses. All the valleys drain directly or indirectly into the Kabul R. The hills separating the main valleys are all of considerable altitude, rugged and toilsome, and in consequence K. is converted in winter into a number of separate communities, without the means of intercommunication. Three entirely distinct languages are spoken. That spoken by the greatest number is the language of the Siah-Posh, who are so called because they affect dark-coloured, nearly black, clothing. The other chief languages are those of the Wai and the Presun people. In religion all the tribes are idolaters, with traces of ancestor-worship. Imru is the creator of all things, but there are a large number of secondary deities, male and female, the chief of these being Gish, the war-god. The commonest dress is a goatskin. See *Geog. Kalahari (from Karri-karri, native name = 'the tormenting desert'), an extensive region in the interior of S. Africa, between the Orange R. and Zambezi R., in 18°–29½° S. lat., and 18½°–28° E. long. The K. is often described as a desert, but many parts of it are periodically covered with vegetation, and possess the characteristic features of African steppes. The K. consists of large plateaux (3300–5000 ft. above sea-level), which from S., E., and W. slope towards the centre, and the course of the Okavango R. indicates that the NW. parts have the same tendency. Sandy tracts of land, a white limestone of recent geological age, and numerous salt-pans prove that in former times there were a number of inland lakes in the K., the last remnant of them being Lake Ngmai. All the water-courses of the K. are periodic, with the exception of the Okavango, which flows into Lake Ngami. This river, however, belongs but partially to the territory in question, and derives its water-supply from the north-western regions far beyond the limits of the K. Of periodic water-courses must be mentioned the Omuramba, Epukiro, Nosob, Molopo, and Hygap. Salt-pans of importance are those of Etosha, Ntwe-ntwe, and Soa. Little is known about the climate of the K.; the summer months are oppressively hot, and the winters seem to be rainy and comparatively cold. The rainfall is larger than might be expected: Schinz, e.g., has observed that in the winter rain and thunderstorms are by no means rare near Lake Ngami. The K. is but thinly peopled by Bushmen, Bechuanas, Bakalahari, Bamangwato, Batovana, and Bayeye. They live either as nomadic hunters, or have permanent settlements in the better localities, e.g., in the districts near Lake Ngami and E. of it. Area estimated at 350,000 sq. m. P. estimated at 50,000. [H. G. S.]

Kaluga, govt. of middle Russia, has Moscow on N., Tula on E., Orel and Chernigov on S., and Smolensk on W. Surface an elevated plain, reaching 800 to 900 ft. in its highest spots, deeply cut in by the river valleys and ravines. Chiefly Carboniferous limestones and Devonian sandstones, covered with outliers of marine Jurassic clays, all clothed with thick layers of boulder clay. Thin layers of coal; iron ores, fire-clay, and building stone extracted. Soil, chiefly unfertile clay. Watered by Oka and its navigable tribs., Ugra and Zhizdra, and many smaller streams. The Bolva, trib. of Desna, in S. Forests cover nearly 40 per cent. of surface, and timber exported. Population, Great Russian throughout, with a few Karelian Finns in centre. Agriculture carried on everywhere, but crops insufficient, and grain imported; extensive culture of hemp for export; meadows insufficient, and cattle-breeding in decline. Gardening and orchards for export of vegetables. Part of the population is engaged in transport of goods, and considerable numbers of men go every year southwards in search of work as carpenters and navvies. All sorts of domestic trades carried on in villages, some trades attaining considerable development. K. belongs to the industrial govts. of middle Russia, and industries are rapidly developing. Iron-works, cotton-mills, woollen cloth, linen, paper-mills, glass-works, tanneries. Considerable trade in iron, paper, leather, glass, chemicals, linen, hemp, hempseed, hempseed oil, and hides exported; corn and manufactured goods imported or shipped through. Brisk traffic on the Oka ports. Divided into eleven dists.: Kaluga, Borovsk, Kozelsk, Likhvin, Maloyaroslavets, Medyn, Meshchovsk, Mosalsk, Peremyshl, Tarusa, and Zhizdra. Several villages, as Ludinovsk, Pesochensk, Polotnyanyi Zavod, are important industrial or commercial centres. Area, 11,942 sq. m. P. (1834) 914,900; (1862) 969,919; (1890) 1,242,900.

Kama, large riv. of E. Russia, l. bk. trib. of the Volga (Cholman-idel, or Ak-idel of the Tatars); rises on a plateau of the govt. Vyatka, flows first through a woody, sparsely inhabited region NW., NE., and SE., receiving the Keltma and Vishera, and becoming navigable in this latter part of its course. Solikamsk, Dyedukhin, and Usoliye are on its banks. At Perm, where it receives the great navigable Chusovaya, which flows from the Urals past many important iron-works, the K. turns towards SW. and W., and flows past Okhansk, Yelabuga, Chistopol, and Laishev, receiving the Byelaya and Ik from the left, and Vyatka from the right, and many others. It reaches the Volga 43 m. below Kazañ. By bringing the iron-works and gold-washings, as well as the grain-growing region of the Urals, into connection with the Volga, the K. has a very great importance for trade, the more so as it also constitutes the chief artery for trade with Siberia. Perm (which is connected by rail with Tyumen, in Siberia) being the chief entrepôt for the tea, furs, and animal produce, shipped from, as well as for manufactured goods exported to, Siberia, all the produce which is sent from the Urals to middle Russia, i.e., metals and metallic goods, grain, timber and wooden goods, animals and all sorts of animal produce, are shipped down the K. and its several navigable tribs., while all the produce and manufactured goods required for the mining centres of the Urals are sent up the K. and its tribs. The amount of goods loaded on the banks of the K. and its tribs. attained 450,000 tons (worth £2,150,000) in the years 1859-62, while in 1891 it exceeded 1,830,000 tons, and the transit of Siberian goods down and up the K. itself must have increased in proportion. Kamchatka, large penin. of NE. Asia, in N. Pacific, stretching 850 m. SW., and southwards from the land of the Chukchis, with a width of from 70 to 250 m., between the Sea of Okhotsk in the W., and Bering Sea in the E.; 51°-60° N., 155°-164° 20′ E. Forms part of maritime prov. (Primorskaya Oblast) of Siberia; its NW. coast has only one bay, the Penzhinskaya, at its head, while the SE. coast is indented by several large bays, Kamchatskiy zaliv, Kronotskiy, Petropavlovskiy, &c., Cape Lopatka at its S. extremity. The penin. is continued to the SW. by the range of the Kurile islands toward Yezo (Japan). Surface hilly, high marshy plains in N.; flat lowlands only along some coasts. Two parallel ridges of mountains running SW. to NE., and having steep slopes to the SE., fill up the penin., and are separated from each other by the fertile valley where the Bystraya R. flows SW., while the Kamchatka R. flows NE. The more northern ridge of the two joins in the N. the high plateau of NE. Asia and its border-ridge, the Stanovoi Mts. Granites, porphyries, and Archæan crystalline slates, partly covered with Eocene sandstones and limestones, enter into the composition of these ridges, so also basalts, trachytes, and volcanic lavas. No less than twelve active volcanoes, and twenty-six extinct ones, from 7000 to 16,000 ft. high, are known, all active volcanoes being near to the E. ct. Klyuchevskaya Sopka (15,762 ft., last eruption in 1854), Shevelyuch (9900 ft), are the highest of the former, while the Koryakskaya (11,090 ft.), Ushkinskaya and Kronotskaya Sopkas are the chief among the extinct volcanoes. Native copper, magnetic iron, brown coal, amber, excellent mica, and sulphur. Chief rivers: Kamchatka, 310 m., in which valley the chief settlements are situated; Bolshaya (trib. Bystraya), Avacha, and several rivers flowing on NW. slope of main ridge. Climate severe, especially on account of cold current which flows along E. coast, and lowers the temp. of summer, while winter is very cold on the coasts of the Sea of Okhotsk. Heavy snowfalls on E. coast, but little snow on W. coast, where cattle graze in winter. Average temp. at Petropavlovsk, yr. 36°, Jan. 17°, July 58°. Milder climate in interior, especially in the valley of K., where rye, barley, and vegetables are grown. Snow-line at about 5000 ft.; forests on mountain slopes. Pop. consists of Kamchadales, Koryaks (about 3500), Lamutes (Tunguses), and Russians. Chief occupation, fishing and hunting; the rivers are rich in fish, and the shores swarm with morses, sea-lions; some whaling. Reindeer, bears, a moufion, or mountain sheep, probably a mere variety of the Rocky Mt. sheep (Ovis montana), sables, black and red foxes, arctic foxes, squirrels, &c., killed in great numbers; furs exported. K. was discovered and conquered by the Russians in 1696-1706. Subdivided into four dists.: chief town, Petropavlovsk, on SE. ct.; Bolsheryetsk, on SW. extremity; Verkhne- and Nizhne-Kamchatsk, on Kamchatka R. Area, 104,260 sq. m. P. about 7500, of which 4500 are indigenes.

Kamerun, German possession in Equatorial W. Africa. The coast of K. extends from the Rio del Rey (S. of the 5th degree of N. lat.) to the Campo R. (N. of the 2nd degree of N. lat.). The boundary line between the British and German spheres of influence runs from the Rio del Rey to Yola in Adamawa (Yola being British), and thence to the point where the 14th degree of E. long. cuts the southern shore of Lake Chad. The boundary of K., towards the French Congo Terr., runs from the mouth of the Campo R. parallel to the 2nd degree of N. lat., and then N. to Lake Chad (see French Congo Territory). Near the coast the country is generally low, but the Kamerun Mts., a series of lofty peaks of volcanic origin, tower up in the immediate neighbourhood of the sea. The highest of them, called Mongo ma Loba (13,000 ft.), has two craters, called respectively Victoria and Albert. The interior of the K. terr. consists of high plateaux, which slope down more or less abruptly to the Atlantic. The consequence is, that all the rivers coming from the interior have waterfalls and cataracts, which render them unfit for navigation. The principal rivers are the Mungo, Kamerun R., Sannaga-Mbam, and Nyong. In the coast dists. live the Dualla, Bakundu, and Bakoko; the interior is inhabited by the Yeundo, Babu-Babu, Tinga, and other tribes, which are but imperfectly known. The luxuriant tropical vegetation which covers the coast region of K. is unequalled in Africa. The humus, originating from the decomposition of the volcanic rocks, forms a soil of very great fertility; and the cacao, coffee, and tobacco plantations, which have recently been started by the Germans, are successful. The plateaux of the interior are covered with widely extending savannahs, well adapted for cattle-rearing. The principal exports are palm-oil, palm-nut kernels, caoutchouc, and ivory; the principal imports are textiles, rice, salt, spirits, and tobacco. The climate is less unhealthy to Europeans than the surrounding terrs. Places of importance are Victoria, Bimbia, K. town, Batanga, Yaunde, and Ngila. Annual value of exports above £200,000. Area estimated at 170,000 sq. m. P. estimated at 2,500,000. [H. G. S.] Kanawha (ka-naw'wa), co., U.S., W. Virginia, N. of 38° N., and W. of 81° W., traversed by the Great Kanawha R.

Kanawha, Great, riv., U.S., rises in the Appalachian Mts., in the NW. part of N. Carolina, flows NE. through Virginia, and NW. through W. Virginia, and after a course of about 450 m. joins the Ohio near Gallipolis. Chief affluents the Elk, Gauley (above whose confluence the K. is sometimes known as the New R.), Coal, and Greenbrier Rivs. It is navigable by steamers to the falls, 2 m. below the junction of Gauley R., about 90 m. from its mouth. Area of basin, 10,800 sq. m. In the neighbourhood of Charleston salt is produced by boiling a very briny water, extracted from the lower coal measures by deep artesian wells. This and other tracts of the K. valley also produce large supplies of petroleum from similar artesian borings. A little farther N. is a smaller river which falls into the Ohio at Parkersburg, Little K., which is navigable to the oil-regions of Burning Springs, in 38° 55′ N., 81° 17′ W.

Kansas, the central state of the U.S., somewhat smaller than Great Britain, bounded W. by Colorado, and NE. for 150 m. by the Missouri. Cap. Topeka; other chief towns, Kansas city, Wichita, Leavenworth, Atchison, and Fort Scott. The surface consists mainly of undulating prairie, highest in the NW. (about 4000 ft.), and sloping to S. and E. (750 ft. at mouth of Kansas R.). In the S. are low hills (Flint and Gypsum ranges), in the SW. is a belt of sandhills. The chief rivers, besides the Missouri (the only one navigable), are the Kansas and Arkansas, r. bk. tribs. of the Missouri, with their numerous affluents. Carboniferous rocks cover the eastern part of the state, Cretaceous predominate in the W., and Tertiary deposits occur in the NW. Rainfall is deficient W. of the 100th meridian [Dodge City, Leavenworth]. Maize, wheat, and oats are the leading crops; in the S., sorghum; the cultivation of sugar-beet is rapidly extending; fruits of excellent quality are produced. The principal minerals are coal (bituminous coal-beds cover about 17,000 sq. m.), worked chiefly in Crawford, Cherokee, Osage, and Leavenworth counties; lead and zinc in the two first-named counties; and gypsum in Marshall, Barber, and Saline counties; salt occurs as an incrustation over extensive areas S. of the Arkansas R., in brine springs, and in rock beds. K. was crossed by Coronado in 1541; in 1705 French fur-traders settled in it. The greater part of the state was acquired by the Louisiana purchase, the SW. with Texas. During the years 1850–59 the state was desolated by civil war between the pro- and anti-slavery parties. Area, 82,080 sq. m. P. 1,427,096. See United States, table. [E. J. H.]

Kansu, the most NW. prov. of China, between 32° 25′ and 44° 10′ N., 92° 50′ and 108° 40′ E., constituting a wedge thrust forward between Tibet on the SE., and Mongolia on the NW. Surface mountainous in the W., S., and E., the Nan-shan forming part of the Tibetan border, and the Tsinling-shan entering from Shensi; in the NE. are extensive open plains merging into the desert of Gobi, in which the N. portion is entirely situated. The greater portion of the prov. is comprised in the basin of the Hwang-ho, which river bisects it from W. to NE.; the remainder is almost entirely within the continental Gobi basin, and the streams flowing from the Nan-shan Mts. are absorbed either within the prov. or shortly beyond its limits; the extreme S. is watered by the headstreams of rivers trib. to the Yangtse-kiang. Soil consists chiefly of sand, gravel, clay, and loess. Coal is abundant. Millet and beans are the main crops. But little rain or snow falls, and the climate is very dry, especially from October to May; and famines are of periodical occurrence. The country is considered healthy, though temp. has a large range, sinking to 3° F. in the winter, and in summer rising to 95°. The people are excessively poor, and generally inoffensive; whilst the country is to a great extent depopulated and uncultivated, in consequence of the Mohammedan rebellion (1858-75). The prov. is traversed throughout its length by the main trade route from Peking to Kashgar. Area, 125,483 sq. m. P. (estimated 1890) 9,300,000. See China, table.

Karst, Italian Carso, in antiquity Carusavius (name of Celtic origin = 'land of stones'), consists of rugged platforms and mountain ranges rising E. of the Adriatic. The Karst Mts. extend from the Terglou towards S. and SE. until they reach the Shar and other mountains of the Balkan Peninsula. In a more limited sense, we understand by 'Karst proper' the ranges extending N. of Istria from the Isonzo R. to the Quarnero Gulf: they are about 50 m. in length, 15 m. in width, and have an average altitude of 1300 to 1600 ft. The highest summit of the Karst proper is the Snow Mt. (Sneznica, or Schneeberg, 5890 ft.). The mountain ranges further to the SE., viz., the Great Capella Mts. (Klek, 5400 ft.), the Vellebic (5770 ft.), Dinaric Alps (Dinara, 6010 ft.), and others have the same orographical and hydrographical features as the Karst proper, and therefore the term Karst in a more general sense is applied to all of them, and thus we speak of Istrian, Croatian, and Dalmatian Karst Mts. Even further SE., in the Herzegovina, in Montenegro, and Albania, K. features are noticeable. The Karst Mts. consist principally of limestone rocks, mostly of the Cretaceous period. The rain which falls immediately disappears in the ground, and there is a subterranean process of erosion, partly chemical and partly mechanical, by which innumerable caves and funnel-shaped depressions or sinks (dolinas) are formed. Subterranean watercourses are frequent, and many rivers suddenly disappear under the ground, either reappearing after a while, or coming no more to the surface. The valleys present a very peculiar appearance; many of them have neither beginning nor end, but form circular or longitudinal grooves and hollows between the mountain ranges. Earthquakes and landslips are of frequent occurrence. The greater part of the Karst terr. is desert, but in former times the mountains were covered with beautiful forests, which supplied the Romans, and afterwards the Venetians, with excellent material for the construction of their numerous fleets. See Dalmatia, Istria, and compare Causses. [H. G. S.]

Karun (more correctly Kuran, or Kurang, from the Kuh-i-Rang, in which it has its source), the ancient Pasitigris, riv., Persia, Khuzistan, rises in the heart of the Bakhtiari Mts., and has a very sinuous course of 250 m. to Shushter (75 m. in a direct line), with a fall of 9000 ft. Here it enters the plain, and divides into two arms, the eastern, called the Ab-i-Gargar, artificial, and the western, called the Ab-i-Shateit, natural, the former being that which allows of navigation to near Shushter. These two arms reunite in 31° 39′ N., at the point where the K. receives the Dizful R., or Ab-i-Diz, from the right. Below this point the K. pursues a general SSW. direction towards the Shat-el-Arab, with which it is connected by an artificial cut 4 m. long called the Hafar (or Haffar) Canal (on which stands Mohammera), while the original stream continues its way to the Persian Gulf under the name of the Bahmeshir, or Bankhusi, channel to the E. of Kab I. The navigation of the K. is impeded at Ahwaz, 117 m. from its mouth, by rapids, both below and above which steamers ply as far as Shushter. In 1888 the Shah granted a concession, throwing open the navigation below Ahwaz to all countries, but in its undeveloped state it has up till now been almost valueless. See Proc. R. G. S., 1890, p. 509; Persia, by Hon. G. H. Curzon, Lond., 1892; and map of the Ahwaz obstruction, in Proc. R. G. S., 1883, p. 184.

Kashmír and Jammu (Cashmere and Jummoo) form together a large native state, about one-ninth smaller than Great Britain, in the extreme NW. of India. It is nominally subject to a mahárájá, but since 1889 has been virtually under British administration. The state is the most mountainous in India, containing some of the highest mountains and passes of the Himálayas and the Karakoram Mts. The slopes of the mountains are clothed with forests where they look to the N., but generally bare on the S. The whole region is subject to earthquakes. The population is mostly confined to a few considerable valleys lying here and there among the mountains at different elevations, and inhabited by people differing in race, customs, disposition, language, and religion. The most important of these valleys is that of Kashmír proper (chief town, Srínagar), a beautiful expanse traversed by the Jehlam and its r. bk. trib. the Sind, between the first and second chains of the Himálayas, at the height of rather more than 5000 ft. above sea-level. The Jehlam (q.v.) is here a quiet stream, the windings of which, as seen from the isolated trap peak adjacent to Srínagar, called Takht-i-Suláimán (6950 ft.), are said by the natives to have suggested the pattern of the K. shawls. It is navigable from Islamábád, in the E. of the valley, to its entrance into Lake Wulúr, and then after its exit from that lake to the gorge of Baramula. The valley has a delightful temperate climate, fitting it for the production of nearly all the fruits and grains of the temperate zone (apples, pears, plums, peaches, apricots, the wine-grape, wheat, barley, &c.), as well as rice. Good wine and brandy are made, but their preparation is at present a monopoly of the mahárájá. The silkworm is also reared, and the inhabitants are industrious in manufactures. They have long been noted for the exquisitely soft shawls, which they make from the fine winter-wool (pashm), but this manufacture has greatly declined of late years. Other branches of the woollen manufacture are, however, carried on, and the artistic metal-work of the Kashmíris is almost as well known as their shawls. Notwithstanding these advantages, the population has been dwindling away in consequence of the oppressive character of the government; but since the British assumed control, attempts have been made to improve the condition of the people, and to attract new settlers. This valley is mainly inhabited by Sunnite Mohammedans, who have long been subject, however, to a dominant Hindu caste, though the privileges of the ruling race have been curtailed by the British. There are several routes leading out of the valley both W. and S. into the Punjab, and northwards across the second chain of the Himálayas into the valley of the Indus. At present (1893) the only road in K. fit for wheeled vehicles is that on the westerly route following the course of the Jehlam to Muzaffarpur, and then continuing S. through the gorge of Baramula to Kohala, on the Punjab frontier, where it joins the road to Ráwal Pindi. The chief southerly route leads across the Banihál Pass into the terr. of Jammu, which lies to the S. of the Chenáb, and whose cap., bearing the same name, is now connected with the railway system of India. Another leads across the Pír Panjál Pass (11,500 ft.), SW. of Srínagar, and then S. by Naoshera to Gujrat. The chief northerly route is that which goes north-eastwards to Leh in Ladákh, an expansion of the Indus basin at the height of more than 11,000 ft. above sea-level, in the E. of K., an arid dusty region of bare tablelands, with rainless valleys, dependent on irrigation from snow-fed rivers, and inhabited mainly by Tibetan Buddhists practising polyandry. The road first ascends the Sind valley, and afterwards crosses three passes, the Zoji-la (11,500 ft.), the Namika-la (13,000 ft.), and the Fotu-la (13,400 ft.), the first of which, though the lowest, is the most difficult, on account of the violence of the winds, as well as the fact that the range that it crosses is the only one which receives any great amount of precipitation. From Leh a trade-route leads NE. across the Chang-la (above 18,000 ft.), and affords communication both with Chinese Tibet and northwards by the Karakoram Pass with Eastern Turkistan. The lower part of the Indus valley is separated from Ladakh by a pathless river-gorge, and access to that region is obtained by the Chorbat Pass (16,700 ft.), leading N. into the valley of the Shaiok (Shyok), l. bk. trib. of the Indus. From the K. valley, however, this region, Baltistan or Little Tibet, a rugged tract between the Karakoram range on the N., and the second chain of the Himálayas in the S., is reached in winter, after crossing the Zoji-la by the valley of the Suru, which opens into that of the Indus below the gorge, and in summer by routes crossing the lofty plateau of Deosai, further W. Baltistan, the valley bottoms in which are at an elevation of above 7000 ft. [Iskardo], is inhabited by people of various but mainly, like the Ladákhis, of Mongolian origin, but for the most part Shiah Mohammedans in religion, and consequently polygamous. Still farther to the NW. a comparatively open valley, inhabited by Dards, that of the riv. Gilghit or Yasin, opens south-eastwards into that of the Indus. The town of Gilghit, to which a road from Srínagar is now (1893) being made, crossing the Himálayas by the Rajdiangan Pass (11,800 ft.) and the Borzil Pass (13,500 ft.), both at present impassable for the greater part of the year, and proceeding thence by Astor and Bunji, occupies the middle of the valley, at the height of rather less than 5000 ft. above the sea. The mineral wealth of K. generally is not great. Sapphires are found in the basin of the Bhutna (trib. Chenab), to the SE. of Srínagar, at the height of about 13,000 ft., but the mines are not rich. Area of state, 80,900 sq. m. P. (1891, the first census ever taken) 2,544,000, about 31 to the sq. m.

Kazañ, govt., middle Russia, at confluence of Volga and Kama, has Nizhniy Novgorod on W., Vologda on N. and NE., Ufa on SE., Samara and Simbirsk on S. and SE. Surface an elevated plain, from 550 to 700 ft. above the sea, reaching 1050–1260 ft. in its highest spots in SE. and E., where it joins the plateaux of middle Urals. A low depression, only from 175 to 400 ft. of altitude, occupies its central parts, representing the bottom of a great lake which was occupied in the Post-Pliocene period by an expansion of the Caspian Sea extending up the middle Volga and the lower Kama, and now covered chiefly with sands and elongated low sandy ridges clothed with Scotch fir forests, as well as with small lakes and marshes, or with tracts of fertile black earth. The higher plains are thickly clothed with forests. All covered with glacial boulder-clay and lacustrine deposits overlying Permian sandstones and Triassic 'variegated marls.' Watered by the Volga and Kama, the former receiving from the left the Vetluga, Ilet, Kazanka, and Great Cheremshan; and from the right the Sura and Sviyaga, while the Kama receives the Vyatka and many small streams. Climate severe; average temp., yr. 37°, Jan. 7°, July 67°; yearly rfall., 15.3 in. Formerly seat of the Volga Bulgaria, which had its chief towns at Bolgary and Suvar. P. consists of Great Russians (42 per cent.), Tatars (29 per cent.), Chuvashes (22 per cent.), Cheremises (6 per cent.), Mordovians (1 per cent.). Agriculture chief occupation, but insufficient for population; cattle-breeding hampered by want of meadow lands; fishing, bee culture. All sorts of house industries in villages, wooden ware, leather, and felt goods exported, as well as timber. Cotton and woollen cloth mills, iron-works, building of steamers and smaller crafts, carriage making. Considerable trade due to most advantageous position on two great rivers, and on highway to Siberia. Divided into twelve dists.: Kazañ, Cheboksary, Chistopol, Kozmodemiyansk, Laishev, Mamadyzh, Sviyazhsk, Spassk, Tetyushi, Tsarevokokshaisk, Tsyvilsk, and Yadrinsk. Several villages on the navigable rivers are very populous, and more important than towns. Area, 24,601 sq. m. Mean temp., yr. 37.4° F., Jan. 7.0°, July 67.8°. P. (1834) 1,220,700; (1862) 1,604,705; (1891) 2,208,917.

Kazañ, tn., Russia, cap. govt. K., on l. bk. of Volga, 3 m. from its junction with Kazanka R., on a low plain inundated by the Volga at high water, 548 m. E. of Moscow, and 276 m. from Nizhniy-Novgorod rly. terminus. Observatory, 55° 48′ N., 49° 46′ E. Alt. 280 ft. Mean rfall. (20 yrs.), yr. 15.3 in., May–Sept. 10.3 in. Formerly cap. of an important Tatar khanate, taken by the Russians in 1552. Has an old citadel, the Kremli, and is surrounded by several large villages, some of which already may be considered as forming part of the town. A considerable industrial activity has lately developed; cotton mills, iron and copper works, tallow, soap, and candle works, large tanneries, carriage works, flour and starch mills. The ports of K. are Kazanskaya on Kazanka R., when the Volga is in inundation; Ust-Kazanskaya, at the mouth of the Kazanka, and Bakaldinskaya, on the Volga. The shipping to and from these three ports is very considerable, timber, corn, tallow, hides, leather, and metals being shipped to and from the upper and the lower Volga and the Kama. P. rapidly increasing: (1862) 60,230; (1891) 134,359.

[1] The area of ancient county, inclusive of dists. now in the administrative county of London, is 995,344 ac. P. 1,142,324. The administrative county includes also the part of Tunbridge Wells, urban sanitary dist. in the ancient county of Sussex, but excludes the dists. now in the county of London. Area, 975,820. P. 808,736.

Surface undulating, mainly under 500 ft. in all, but varied by the N. Downs, chain of hills running W. to E. across the county, ending in the lofty cliffs of Dover, Folkestone, and Hythe. The main mass of rocks are Lower Cretaceous, in the Kentish portion of the Weald (q.v.), succeeded on the N. by Upper Cretaceous rocks, forming the N. Downs, and terminating in the cliffs of Dover. To this formation belongs also, in the NE. angle of the county, the Isle of Thanet, which is, however, separated from the chalk of the Downs by the strip of London clay, which forms the greater part of the N. shore of Kent. In the SE. an area of alluvium occurs in the level triangular tract, terminating in the low shingly promontory of Dungeness. Besides the Thames and Medway, the chief rivers are the Beult, Stour, and Darent. K. is a very fertile county, and produces cereals, fruits, and hops abundantly; woods extensive. In the cultivation of hops K. has always been the leading county in England, having from more than six times as great an area under this crop than any other county. Since 1885 the area under this crop has decreased by about 10,000 ac. (partly in consequence of increased foreign imports, but partly, it would seem, from the increasing use of 'hop substitutes' by brewers),, but the hop acreage in K. (nearly 5 per cent. of the whole surface) is still next in extent to that of the three leading cereals, and far ahead of that of any of the ordinary green crops. As regards soil, hops are very exacting and exhausting. The best soils for it are obtained on the Lower Cretaceous area (principally the Weald Clay and Lower Greensand), but hops are grown in places even on the chalk. In respect of its orchards, K. ranks fourth among English counties in absolute area, and fifth if we consider their extent relatively to the total area of the county. There is a large traffic by rail in fruit to the NW. of England, and even to Aberdeen, carried on by means of special trains, which return to London chiefly loaded with milk. The centre of this trade is Faversham. Among other agricultural specialties may be mentioned maize, which, though it does not ripen, is largely grown for green fodder. (For statistics of the ordinary crops, see Appendix, pp. 7–9.) The manufactures include the making of bricks, tiles, pottery, cement and lime, paper, gunpowder, sugar-moulds, tobacco pipes, hop-bags, sacks, copperas, sugar refining, tar, whiting, and Tunbridge ware. There are also considerable shipbuilding and marine-engine yards, iron-foundries, breweries, maltings, and tanneries. The county is traversed by the SE. R. (which has works at Ashford) and L. C. & D. R. Coal has been found near Dover, and borings are being made to ascertain whether it exists there in workable quantity. Historically, K. is rich in associations. It was the country of the Cantii, and the first established kingdom of the Saxon Heptarchy (end of 5th century). Four of the Cinque ports belong to this county (Dover, Romney, Sandwich, and Hythe), which, as the point of England nearest the Continent, has been noted for its naval resources. Kentucky, one of the United States of America, more than two-thirds the size of England, bounded N. by the Ohio R. Cap. Frankfort; other chief towns, Louisville, Covington, Newport, Lexington, Paducah, Maysville. The E. belongs to the Alleghany region, and in the SE. the parallel Cumberland and Pine Mts. enclose between them Cumberland Valley. At the junction of K. with Virginia and Tennessee is Cumberland Gap, 1600 ft. The surface descends to NW. in a series of plateaux, through which the rivers have cut deep channels. The principal rivers are Ohio (640 m.) and Mississippi (80 m.), on N. and W. frontier respectively; Big Sandy, Licking, Kentucky, Green, Cumberland, and Tennessee, l. bk. tribs. of Ohio R., all in great part navigable. In the NW. is the Blue Grass region, a rich undulating tract of about 10,000 sq. m., walled in by abrupt ridges; another tract of similar extent is found in SW.; W. of Green R. are the 'barrens,' really productive prairie-land, diversified with oak-crowned knolls. Saline incrustations, known as 'licks,' occur in several marshy tracts. About two-thirds of the state is under forest. Permo-carboniferous rocks cover most of the state; in the N. are Silurian rocks, flanked by Devonian. K. is noted for its numerous caves (including the famous Mammoth Cave), which are excavated in the Carboniferous limestone of the N. There are many mineral springs. Climate mild [Louisville], and very healthy. Rainfall abundant, increasing from Ohio R. to SE. The leading agricultural products are maize and wheat, tobacco (two-thirds of the U.S. crop), and hemp. The finest horses in the U.S. are bred in K. The principal mineral is coal, worked chiefly in Hopkins, Ohio, Laurel, and Whitby counties. The production of natural gas, discovered in 1889, is rapidly increasing; iron ore, asphalt, and petroleum are obtained to a limited extent. The first white settlement was formed in 1774, and two years later K. became a county of Virginia. Area, 40,400 sq. m. P. 1,858,635. See United States, table. [E. J. H.]

Ker'guelen Land, isl., Indian Ocean, its S. extremity, Cape Challenger, being in 49° 46′ S., 70° 5′ E. It is of very irregular shape, with a remarkable extent of coast line, possessing no less than fifteen peninsulas and numerous detached islands. Length about 110 m. It is traversed by numerous ridges, composed chiefly of basalt; greatest elevation, Mount Ross, 6166 ft.; glaciers descend from extensive snow-fields. The flora and fauna are both excessively poor, except sea birds, and it is a perfect land of desolation. The affinities of the flora are chiefly Fuegian. Discovered by Kerguelen in 1772; annexed by France, 1893. Mean summer temp. 41.7° F. Area estimated at about 2500 sq. m. Uninhabited.

Kermadec Islands, a group of four small volcanic islands and several islets in the Pacific Ocean, between 29° 10′ and 31° 30′ S., 177° 45′ and 179° W. Sunday (or Raoul) I., the largest and most N., is 20 m. in circumference, with a rugged surface, covered with forest. Soil very rich. The other islands are much smaller, and without trees. Fish are plentiful round the coasts. Named after Huon de Kermadec, commander of the Esperance in the fleet under D'Entrecasteaux. Annexed by Great Britain in 1886, and to New Zealand in 1887. Area, 13 sq. m.

Kerman, the ancient Caramania, a large interior prov. of S. Persia, with undefined limits, approximately between 28° and 31° N., 55° and 59° E. It consists chiefly of an elevated mountainous country lying in a NW.–SE. direction, bordered on either side by salt deserts. Soil is generally barren, except where the mountain streams can be utilised for irrigation, chiefly for pasture for fine-wooled sheep, camels, and goats; silk-worms are reared. The climate is unhealthy, hot and dry. Coal, iron, copper, lead, and manganese exist, but are little worked; and there are several turquoise mines.

Kerman, city, Persia, cap. prov. K., in 30° 20′ N., 57° 2′ E., 225 m. N. by E. Bender Abbas, its port on the Persian Gulf. It stands in a plain surrounded by mountains; enclosed within a mud wall, and contains a fort. Situated at the confluence of important routes, the city is a great trading emporium between the Persian Gulf and the marts of northern Persia and central Asia. The bazaars are lofty and well built, and the city has a commercial manufacturing reputation. Manufactures are chiefly shawls and cotton carpets, of excellent quality, and silk goods. The town has been repeatedly sacked and destroyed by invaders from the E. and W., the last occurring in 1794, after a siege of several months by Agha Mohammed Khan. The present town was shortly after built a little to the NW. of the former site. Alt. 5680 ft. P. about 40,000.

Surface extremely wild, rugged, and mountainous. Currantuohill, in Macgillicuddy Reeks (the loftiest mountains in Ireland), 3414 ft., Brandon, 3127 ft., and Mangerton, 2756 ft., are in this county, which contains also, near the middle of the county, the celebrated Lakes of Killarney, and in the extreme W. Lake Currane, but slightly divided from Ballinskelligs Bay (q.v.). Several of the mountain ridges terminate in bold headlands, the valleys between which are the basins of noble bays and estuaries, into which the rivers empty themselves. The coast line is a very long one, owing to the great depth of its indentations, the chief of which are Tralee and Dingle Bays, and Kenmare R. Chief rivers are the Feale, which detaches bar. Iraghticonnor (in the N.) from the rest of the county, the Maine and Laune, both entering Dingle Bay, and the latter draining (NW.) Lough Leane, and the Roughty (in the S.), entering Kenmare R. Among the numerous islands off the coast are Valentia (q.v.) to the S., and the Blaskets to the N. of the mouth of Dingle Bay. The W. and S. portions of the county belong to the Upper Silurian rocks, edged round Kenmare R., S. coast of Dingle Bay, and in other places by Old Red Sandstone and Devonian. The N. and E. are of unproductive Carboniferous rocks, varied by an isolated area of Old Red Sandstone and Devonian in the extreme NW., and a productive region in the NE. There are few minerals of economic importance, but slates and flagstones are quarried on Valentia I. Agriculture very backward. The county is one of the most 'congested' in Ireland [Ireland, Condition of the People]. (For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12.) The climate is exceptionally mild. Several trees, considered indigenous to warmer latitudes (particularly the arbutus), grow to great size and beauty here. The Great Southern and Western Rly. traverses the central portion of the county to Tralee, to which a branch of the Waterford and Limerick Rly. runs viâ Listowel, and from Farranfore, on the G. S. & W. R., there is a branch to Valentia Harbour. The county returns four members to Parliament (N., S., E., and W. divs.). In the early part of the reign of Elizabeth the county was the most flourishing part of the S. of Ireland, rich in corn, and the most populous county of Munster, but by a series of rebellions in the latter part of her reign was reduced to a state of misery and ruin. See Ireland, table.

Here is a royal palace, once the favourite residence of George III.; it is surrounded by ornamental grounds, covering 120 ac., and containing a pagoda 163 ft. in height. The royal botanic gardens, 70 ac. in extent, possessing one of the most celebrated collections of plants in Europe, was presented to the nation by Queen Victoria in 1840, and is now kept up at the national cost, and is open to the public. The gardens contain three museums, the Jodrell laboratory, and a picture gallery, containing pictures of flowers and other vegetation painted in all parts of the world by Miss Marianne North, and presented by her to the gardens. The palm-house is unrivalled, being 362 ft. by 100 ft. An arboretum of 178½ ac. has been added to the gardens. Annual rfall. at the Meteorological Observatory (alt. 19 ft., 1866–80), 24.7 in. PMT.O. Kiangpei-ting, tn., China, Süchwan, on the l. bk. of the Yangtse-kiang, and of the Kialing-kiang, adjoining Chungking on the N.

Kiangping, port, China, prov. Kwangtung, on the Tongking border, adjoining Mongkai. P. 4–5000.

Kiangsi, interior prov. of China, between 24° 30′ and 30° N., 113° 35′ and 118° 45′ E. It is entirely comprised in the basin of the Yangtse-kiang, which passes through the N. extremity of the prov., and is traversed throughout its length from S. to N.

by the Kan-kiang, which with numerous affluents supplies the Poyang lake. The soil is somewhat inferior, producing rice and wheat in the valleys and low lands on the Yangtse-kiang, and timber in the mountains; tea of the finest quality is the staple article of export; tobacco and rhea fibre are also cultivated. An inferior coal is found at Loping; but the prov. does not appear to possess much mineral wealth except china-clay, used in the manufacture of porcelain at the imperial potteries at Kingtechin, E. of the Poyang lake. Cap. Nanchang. Area, 69,499 sq. m. P. (estimated 1890) 24,600,000. See China, table.

Kiangsu ('many rivers'), prov., China, on the Eastern Sea, between 30° 30′ and 35° 15′ N., 116° 30′ and 121° 50′ E. It is situated entirely in the great plain of China, and the surface is almost uninterruptedly level, scored by innumerable streams and canals, which institute an almost continuous navigation throughout the prov., and containing many large lakes. Extensive sandbanks stretch out from the coast 40–80 m. in nearly its whole length. The embouchure and lower course of the Yangtse-kiang are in the prov., which is also intersected throughout its length N. of that river by the Grand or Imperial Canal; and the Hwang-ho (q.v.) formerly crossed it. The alluvial soil, of which the prov. is almost exclusively composed, renders it one of the richest and most fertile in the empire, supporting a dense population. All kinds of cereals are produced in abundance, especially rice; pulse, fruits, tobacco, cotton, and flax are also cultivated, with tea in the extreme S.; and the silk-worm is reared. The coasts, lakes, and rivers abound with fish. The climate is temperate and healthy; much of the marsh-land has been drained. Extensive salines are established on the coasts. Manufactures, which are all of superior quality, are chiefly silk-stuffs, nankeen, and lacquered goods. Cap. Nanking. Area, 40,140 sq. m. P. (1842) 39,647,000.

Kiangwan, tn., China, prov. Kiangsu, 5 m. N. Shanghai.

Surface a plateau of from 600 to 700 ft. alt., which has a steppe character in middle. It gently slopes to the N., towards the low, woody, and marshy region of the Pripet, belonging to the Polyesie, is intersected by the spurs of the Carpathians in the W. (900–1050 ft.), and falls by a steep slope, intersected by ravines, to the 250–300 ft. high valley of the Dnieper. Ridge of granites and syenites in S., the remainder being Eocene clays, sands and sandstones, all covered with Quaternary boulder-clays. Fireclay and china clay, lignite, peat, and bog-iron ores. Soil fertile, especially the black earth of the steppes. Forests cover one-fifth of surface; watered by the Dnieper along NE. boundary, and its tribs.: navigable, Pripet, Teterev, and many small ones, and a few tribs. of the Bug. Active navigation on Dnieper, chief river ports being Rzhishchev, Kiev, and Cherkasy. Marshes in N. Climate moderate, average temp. at K. being, yr. 44°, Jan. 21°, July 68°; yearly rainfall 20.8 in. (summer, 7.8 in.). Population chiefly Little Russian (86 per cent.), Jews (12 per cent.), and Poles (2.5 per cent.). Chief occupation agriculture, two-thirds of area under crops, and corn exported. Beetroot extensively cultivated for sugar-works; good gardening; attempts at silkworm culture. Good cattle, and fine breeds of sheep; bee-culture. Considerable development of industries, K. being the chief centre of Russian sugar-works, woollen cloth mills, distilleries, tanneries, flour mills, &c. Exportation of grain, sugar, woollen cloth, china, timber, honey, and wax. Divided into 12 dists.: Kiev, Berdichev, Cherkasy, Chighirin, Kanev, Lipovets, Radomysl, Skvira, Tarashcha, Umañ, Vasilkov, Zvenigorod. Several populous villages from 5000 to 10,000 inhabitants. Area, 19,691 sq. m. P. (1862) 2,017,262; (1890) 3,138,900.

Kiev (Kiyef), tn., Russia, cap. of govt. K., third capital of Russia, on the hills of r. bk. of Dnieper, 626 m. by rail SW. of Moscow (viâ Kursk), and 405 m. by rail NW. of Odessa. Observatory in 50° 27′ 12″ N., 30° 30′ 18″ E. Alt. 594 ft.; level of Dnieper, 288 ft. Old city, mentioned in annals under 864 A.D. as conquered by Varyague chieftains. Was chief city of Russia, very populous and wealthy, and centre of Russian learning in the 12th and 13th centuries. It lost its population and importance after it had been devastated by Batyi's Mongol invasion in 1240, its ruins remaining for years uninhabited. It was conquered by Lithuania in 1320, and later on, from 1569 to 1654, was part of Poland, when it was reconquered by Russia. K. now covers a strip of land 10 m. long and 2–2½ m. wide along the Dnieper, and consists of three parts: Pechersk and Old K. on the hills, connected together by the rich street Kreshchatik and the Podol on the low banks of the Dnieper, which is crossed here by the railway on a grand iron bridge. It is protected by a first-rank fortress, Pecherskaya, which contains the arsenal for SW. Russia. Its cathedral was built in 1037 by Yaroslav I., on the model of Ste. Sophie at Constantinople, and part of the old building, as well as Yaroslav's grave, have been preserved till now. Many churches have been rebuilt upon the foundations of churches which existed in the 10th and 12th century, or of pre-Christian temples. The several monasteries, especially the Kievo-Pecherskaya Lavra, and the caverns which have been inhabited by monks in olden times, are visited every year by thousands of pilgrims. K. has a university, with over 2000 students, and various scientific societies, and is well provided with educational institutions and schools, general and technical, both for boys and girls. Large sugar-works and refineries, tanneries, woollen cloth manufactures, steam flour mills, chemical and iron works; all sorts of small industries. Considerable trade in grain, wool, tallow, hides, leather, sugar, glass, china, salt, metallic goods, and wooden ware exported partly by rail and partly shipped on the Dnieper, K. being the centre of commercial operations for all SW. Russia in its trade with middle Russia and the Urals, as well as an important custom-house for foreign imports. The Kreshchenskaya fair in January shows returns for £1,600,000, the value of goods brought to the fair exceeding £100,000. Four other fairs have also some importance. Mean temp., yr. 44.5° F., Jan. 20.6°, July 68.5°; mean rfall. (29 yrs.), yr. 20.8 in., April–Oct. 14.4 in. P. rapidly increasing (1845) 50,137; (1862) 70,341; (1893) 193,150.

Surface mostly below 500 ft., but rising above that alt. in the extreme E. The Curragh is a dist. in the heart of the county noted for its rich verdure and excellent turf. In the NW. is a portion of the Bog of Allen (having a flat dreary surface, relieved here and there by verdant elevations, here called 'islands'), and two branches of the Grand Canal, by which the Liffey and Shannon are connected (the northern traversing the bog). The main part of the rocks are Carboniferous (two productive areas), but the E. belongs to the Cambrian and Lower Silurian, and granite rocks occur in the extreme S., where the great granitic mountain range which composes nearly the whole of co. Wicklow ends at Castledermot. The chief rivers are the Liffey, which takes a wide curve into the county in the NE., and the Barrow, which runs close along the western boundary of the county. (For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12.) The county has some woollen, cotton, and paper factories, but there are no minerals of economic importance. The chief railway line is the Great Southern & Western, which crosses the county from NE. to SW. The county returns two members to Parliament (N. and S. divs.). In the time of Ptolemy mainly inhabited by the Coriundi. Until 1296, when it was constituted a county of itself, it formed part of the county of Dublin. See Ireland, table.

Kilimane, in Portuguese spelling Quilimane, seapt., Portuguese E. Africa, in 17° 52′ S., on the r. bk. of the Kilimane R., or Kwa-kwa, 12 m. above its mouth, on a great mud-bank surrounded by extensive mangrove swamps and rice-grounds; hence very unhealthy. The Kilimane R., at one time a branch of the Zambezi delta, is now disconnected. It flows mainly E. till it turns SSE. on receiving the Likwali from the NW. just above K. A bar at its mouth impedes the entrance of vessels drawing more than 11½ ft. Above K. it is navigable by canoes to Mopea, in 35° 44′ E., where it is only 6 m. from the Zambezi. A land portage formerly existed here, but it has been abandoned since the discovery of the Chinde mouth of the Zambezi. Exports oil-seeds, rubber, ivory (including hippopotamus and rhinoceros tusks), copra, &c. Retail trade mainly in the hands of Indians.

Kilima-njaro (kilima, the Swahili name for 'mountain,' the remainder of the name variously interpreted), a large volcanic mountain (extinct), in E. Africa, S. of 3° S., and E. of 37° E., rising from a base 40 m. in length E. to W. to two peaks, the higher called Kibo, in 3° 5′ S., 37° 22′ E., a well-marked crater, the other Mawenzi, in which the crater-form has been denuded away, 7 m. to the E.; ice-capt down to about 15,000 ft. (4700 ft. from the top). Well-watered on the S. slopes [Chagga], arid in the N., where the streams issue from the base of the mountain. First ascended by Dr. Hans Meyer in 1889. The boundary between the British and German spheres of influence in E. Africa is deflected, so as to pass round the mountain on the NE. Alt. of Kibo, 19,270 ft. (tr.); of Mawenzi (by better observations), 16,790 ft. (tr. Smith), a difference of 2480 ft.; according to Meyer, Kibo 19,720 ft., Mawenzi 17,570 ft. (ab. and bp. closely following one another), a difference of 2150 ft. See Proc. R. G. S., 1890, pp. 331, &c., and map, p. 372; *Geog. Surface undulating, mostly under 500 ft. in alt., but with considerable areas above that alt., and reaching over 1000 ft. in the NE. of the county. Mainly belonging to the unproductive Carboniferous rocks, with a small productive area (the most important in Ireland, however) in the NE. In the SE. there is a continuation of the granites that form the mountains of Wicklow and Wexford, followed westwards by stratified rocks of pre-Carboniferous age, and then again unproductive Carboniferous deposits. The chief rivers are the Barrow (forming the greater part of the E. boundary of the county), its r. bk. trib., the Nore, and the Suir, forming the S. boundary of the county. The principal mineral product is anthracitic coal (Castlecomer). Coal was first discovered in 1728 below some beds of iron ore which were previously worked. Near the town of K. is the most important quarry of the county, yielding black marble. The soil is very fertile in the valleys. (For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12.) Manufactures flour, beer, whisky, and leather. Railways, the Waterford and Central Ireland, which runs N. and S. through the middle of the county, and is connected at Kilkenny city with a branch of the G. S. & W. R. The county returns 3 members to Parliament; 2 for the county (N. and S. divs.), and 1 for K. city. According to Ptolemy, originally inhabited by the Brigantes and Caucoi, and it afterwards formed part of the kingdom of Ossory. See Ireland, table.

Kilkenny (Cill Chainnigh, church of St. Canice), parl. and mun. bor., civic tn., and co. of a city, Ire., cap. co. K., bar. K., on the Nore (here crossed by two bridges), 24 m. E. Thurles; rly. junc. (See Kilkenny, co.) Kilkenny is a noted city historically, the place of meeting of several parliaments, one of which (1367) is celebrated for the Statute of K., which among other things made it a capital offence for an Englishman to marry an Irish woman. It is the seat of the Anglican and Roman Catholic bishops of Ossory, the see having been removed here from Aghavoe in pre-Reformation days (1178). Among its remains of antiquity are K. Castle, now the residence of the Marquis of Ormond, formerly a fortress of great strength, was besieged and taken by Cromwell in 1650; the cathedral of St. Canice (Anglican), founded soon after the transference of the see to K.; ruins of a Franciscan friary, now partly occupied by a brewery; the Black Abbey (Dominican, 13th century); and two city arches. St. Mary's Cathedral (Roman Catholic) is modern (consecrated 1857). At the grammar school Swift, Congreve, and Berkeley were educated. Coal and black marble are raised near. The manufacture of blankets, coarse woollens, and linens, formerly important, has declined. Market-days, W. and S. Parl. bor. P. (1891) 13,700; mun. bor. and tn. P. (1841) 19,100; (1851) 20,000; (1871) 12,700; (1891) 11,000.

Kincardineshire, maritime co., Scot., on the E. ct., occupying the triangular area between Perthshire and Aberdeenshire. The W. and middle portions of the county belong to the Grampians, but nearly all the remainder consists of gently undulating country under 500 ft. in height, the northern portions of these lowlands belonging to the valley of the Dee, and the south-western (between the Grampians and a somewhat elevated tract to the E. of Laurencekirk) to the great valley of Strathmore, here called the How of the Mearns. The principal mountain is Mount Battock (alt. 2555 ft.), in the extreme W. The chief rivers are the Dee (on the N.), Esk (S. and SW.), and Cowie and Bervie Waters. Geologically, the Grampian area is composed chiefly of granites and crystalline schists, the Dee valley of gneiss, but the remainder of the county from Stonehaven southwards belongs almost entirely to the lower Old Red Sandstone, including, however, towards the E. a considerable tract of igneous rocks of that age. There are no minerals of great economic importance. The C. R. passes through the How of the Mearns, and then from Stonehaven follows the coast north-eastwards. A line belonging to the N. B. R. follows the coast in the SE. (from Montrose, Forfarshire, to Bervie). For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12. Bervie or Inverbervie is the only royal and parl. burgh. The only other towns are Stonehaven (cap.), Laurencekirk, and Banchory. The county returns one member to the House of Commons. Area, 245,347 ac. P. (1891) 35,600; parl. dist. of co. P. 34,400. Kirghiz Steppe (Russian Kirghizskaya Step), name given to a very wide terr. (nearly 185,000 sq. m.) limited by SE. European Russia, southern W. Siberia, the land of the Turkomans (Transcaspian Terr.), Bukhara and Khiva, the Pamirs and Kashgaria. Though mostly having the characters of steppes and prairies, its E. parts are occupied by the Tian Shan Mts. and their spurs. It is now embodied in the Russian Steppe General-Governorship and Russian Turkistan, while the W. portion of the terr. is divided between the European Russia provs. of Uralsk, Astrakhan, and Orenburg. The Kirghiz-Kaisaks, or Kirghiz-Kazaks, are the chief inhabitants of this large terr., and were till lately distinguished as the Kirghizes of the Interior or Bukeyev Horde on the steppes E. of the Volga (Astrakhan, Uralsk, and partly Samara), the Great Horde in Semipalatinsk, the Middle Horde in the middle parts of the terr., and the Small Horde on the slopes of the Urals; while the Kirghizes in the S. parts of Russian Turkistan belong to a separate ethnographic agglomeration of the Kara-Kirghizes (Black, or Dikokamennyie K., Chinese Burutes), who inhabit the basin of Lake Issyk-kul, the higher parts of the former Kokan khanate, the Tian Shan Mts., and the Pamirs. The Kirghiz-Kaisaks appear in history in the second half of the 15th century as federations of stems which did not recognise the authority of Mongolian and Chinese rulers (Kazaks, runaways), and by absorbing many non-Kirghiz stems soon attained the number of 1,000,000, and ruled Turkistan. In the 18th century the Kirghiz-Kaisaks were compelled to move further N., and part of them (the Small Horde) soon accepted the protectorate of Russia. The remainder were gradually conquered by Russia in the 19th century, by erecting lines of Cossack villages in the Steppe, new lines being gradually settled further and further S., till the whole Steppe, and finally the Turkoman terr., were conquered. The Kirghiz-Kaisaks, whose numbers are estimated at about 3,000,000, have their own self-government under their elected sultans, placed under the Russian administration. By their ethnographic features they belong to the E. Turks, with a strongly pronounced Mongolian type in the upper classes. Their religion is a compound of Islamism and idolatry. Their chief occupation is horse and cattle breeding, and occasionally agriculture. The Kara-Kirghizes (the Kian-kuen, or Hakas, of Chinese annals of the 5th century) are originally from the upper basin of the Yenisei (now Siberia and NW. Mongolia). They spread in the 9th century as far S. and SW. as the Pamirs and Tibet. The Yenisei K. have since disappeared, having been exterminated by Russians chiefly in the 18th century, while those of the Tian Shan Mts. still number about 350,000. They live by cattle-breeding, and occasionally agriculture. They consider themselves as Mussulmans, but in reality are Shamanists. They have self-government under Russian authorities.

E. of the city. The proper name of the town is Girin, though the form Kirin has lately become the most current in England. The K. is due to Chinese influence, but the Chinese name, or rather pronunciation, is Kilin, not Kirin. P. about 200,000 (Consular Report, 1885), 75–100,000 (Proc. R. G. S., 1887, p. 549).

Kirkcudbright (ker-ku'brĭ), 'church of St. Cuthbert,' parl. and royal burgh, par., and co. tn., Scot., at mouth of Dee, on the l. bk., on the G. & SW. R. Its harbour, the best in the S. of Scotland, is formed by K. Bay, an inlet forming the estuary of the Dee, 5 m. long by 1 to nearly 2 m. wide, but divided at its head into two parts by the peninsula called St. Mary's Isle, and mostly dry at low water. To the W. of this peninsula, about 1½ m. below the town, there is a bar, on which, however, there is a depth of 20 ft. in ordinary spring tides; and in the channel opposite the town (where there is a small dock) there is a depth varying from 8 ft. at low to 28 ft. at high tide. Market-day, F. Par. 12,280 ac., P.<3500; tn. P.<3000; parl. and royal burgh P. (1891)<3000; parl. dist. P. (1891) 32,700.

Kirkcudbrightshire, or the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, maritime co., S. Scot., forming the eastern half of the dist. of Galloway, bounded N. by Ayrshire, E. by Dumfriesshire, W. by Wigtownshire, and S. by Solway Firth, separating it from Cumberland. Coast-line bold, rocky, some high cliffs. Many coves used by smugglers in former times. K. coast the scene of 'Guy Mannering.' The surface is hilly, and in the NW. mountainous. The chief heights are Mount Merrick (2764 ft.), in the extreme W., with Corserine (2668 ft.) and Carlin's Cairn (2650 ft.) slightly to the ENE.; in the N. is a group (including Cairnsmore of Carsphairn, 2612 ft.) nearly equal to these in altitude; Cairnsmore of Fleet (2331 ft.) rises a few miles NE. of Wigtown Bay, and Criffel (1866 ft.) in the extreme SE. of the county. Lakes are numerous, the principal being Loch Doon, which forms part of the NW. boundary, and is drained S. by W. by the Gala (Galloway or Gallow) Lane into Loch Enoch and Loch Ken, in the middle of the county, the surplus waters of which are drained by the riv. Dee, which passes its S. end, and which after this point broadens into lake-like expansions, which form a continuation of Loch Ken. Principal rivers, the Dee, Fleet, Ken, and Urr. Climate moist, and, except in the uplands, very mild. Geologically, the NW. of the county belongs to the Lower Silurian age, but the greater part of the surface to the Upper Silurian. In the SE., in the valley of the Nith, there is a considerable area of Permian sandstones, and there are three large areas of granite—in the SE., in the NW., and one towards the middle, SW. of New Galloway. The granite quarries of Creetown and Craignair (Dalbeattie) supplied the white granite with which the Liverpool docks and piers were built. Granite quarries also at New Galloway. (For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, p. 10–12.) Pastures excellent; cattle of the polled Galloway breed are reared and fattened for export. Southdown and Cheviot sheep are numerous in the mountains. The honey of this county is noted. Chief town, Kirkcudbright. The only other towns with populations above 2000 are Maxwelltown (part of Dumfries), Dalbeattie, and Castle Douglas. The county returns one member to the House of Commons. Area, 574,588 ac. P. 40,000. See Scotland, table.

Kistná, or Krishna, riv., S. India, rises in the Mahábaleshwar range of the Western Ghâts, only about 40 m. from the Arabian Sea, and winds to the SE., in Bombay Presidency. It then enters the Nizam's dominions, where it drops from the tableland of the Deccan as much as 408 ft. in 3 m., and flows in a curve W., receiving its chief l. bk. trib., the Bhíma, to 15′ 58° N., 78° 20′ E., where its principal r. bk. trib., the Tungabhadra, enters. From this it flows ENE., forming the boundary between Haidarábád and Madras Presidency, then upon reaching the frontier chain of the Eastern Ghâts it turns sharply to SE., and approaching the Lower Godavári forms a delta, and enters the Bay of Bengal by two principal mouths. After leaving the Deccan tableland to the head of the delta (295 m.), the river has an average fall of 3½ ft. per mile; below this it widens out to 3 or 4 m.; and a large quantity of alluvial soil is deposited annually on either side. At Bezwáda, where the K. bursts down through the Eastern Ghâts in a gorge 1300 yards wide, the maximum flood discharge attains the enormous figure of 761,000 cubic ft. per second; and here an anicut has been constructed to conserve the water for irrigation purposes, and regulate the supply to the canals, which have a total length of 254 m. The source of the river is in an ancient temple at the foot of a steep hill 4500 ft. above the sea, and is looked upon as a sacred spot, to which large numbers of pilgrims resort. For navigation the K. is almost useless, its whole course across the tableland being too rocky and rapid even for small craft. Length about 800 m.; area of basin, 97,050 sq. m.

Klausenburg (German), Kolozsvár (Hungarian), municip. and royal free city, Hungary, Transylvania, 80 m. E. by S. Grosswardein (Nagy-Varos), on the Szamos. From remains that have been discovered, it is certain that it occupies the site of a Roman colony, and its mere geographical position in a part of the valley of the Szamos from which there is easy access to that of the Maros (29 m. distant), has always given it importance, at least in local commerce. It has a citadel, is surrounded with thick walls (beyond which there are now large suburbs), is the seat of a university, and of colleges connected with all the more important religions of Hungary; and has manufactures of textiles, machinery, porcelain, tobacco, &c. Birthplace of Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary (1440). Near it are the baths of Jegenyefürdo. In co. Klausenburg or Kolozs. Alt. 1170 ft. P. Kong Mountains, W. Africa, lofty range some 500 or 600 m. in length, formerly believed to exist between Upper Guinea and the Sudan, stretching from the sources of the Niger to beyond the riv. Volta, parallel with the coast. This has been proved incorrect; and although the region has not been thoroughly explored, it appears to comprise isolated mountainous tracts upon the highland at varying distances in the interior, in which some peaks reach 5–6000 ft. above the sea. The whole country is probably highly auriferous.

Its position not far from the opening of the Frisches Haff at Pillau (q.v.), and the navigability of the Pregel for vessels of 9–10 ft. draught, as well as the river connection (by means of the Deime) between Pregel, the Kurisches Haff, and Memel, make K. one of the most important towns of eastern Germany. K. is a first-class fortress, forming one of the most powerful strongholds of the German Empire. It is also celebrated on account of its university, whose world-wide reputation dates from Kant, the great philosopher. K. is one of the commercial and industrial centres of eastern Germany. Hemp, flax, tow, and timber are exported in large quantities; the principal industrial products are iron and ironware, yarns, woven textiles, shoddy, chemicals, leather, and amber. Mean temp., yr. 43.5° F., Jan. 25.5°, July 63.4°; mean rfall. (23 yrs.), 23.9 in. P. (1816) 61,000; (1870) 106,000; (1890) 161,300; (comm.) 161,700. [H. G. S.]

Kootenay, lake, Canada, Brit. Columbia, about 60 m. long N. to S., and 1–4 m. wide, crossed in the N. by 50° N., just E. of 117° W., receives the Kootenay R. (q.v.). Upper K. Lake is a lake about 12 m. long from N. to S., drained S. into the N. end of K. Lake.

Kootenay, riv., western N. America, rises in the Rocky Mts., Brit. Columbia, having several headwaters a little to the N. of 51° N., flows first S. parallel to the Columbia, passing within about 2 m. of the head of Upper Columbia Lake, enters Montana, then making a sharp bend to the NW. passes through Idaho and re-enters Brit. Columbia, flowing into the S. end of K. Lake, which it leaves again about the middle of its W. side, draining it W. into the Columbia, which it joins in about 49° 22′ N., 117° 40′ W. In its upper course it flows through a narrow rocky valley, and is too rapid for navigation; but from Bonner's Ferry, in Idaho, in about 48° 45′ N., 116° 20′ W., to K. Lake it winds quietly, with a depth of 45–60 ft., through a flat valley, 40 m. long and 3–4 m. wide; annually flooded, and filled with a fine river sediment. The upper part of the portion between the K. Lake and the Columbia is also navigable, forming rather a western arm of that lake than a river; but in the last 25 or 30 m. of its course, in which it falls 700 ft., its navigation is completely interrupted by a series of rapids and small falls. Here a railway now runs alongside of it, partly on the N., partly on the S. bank.

Kordofan, co., E. Africa, S. of Nubia, and W. of the White Nile, between 12° and 16° N. lat., and 29½° and 32½° E. long. K. consists of undulating plains, with absolute altitudes from 13-1900 ft., the country rising gradually towards the S. and SW. Some isolated mountains rise to about 2600 ft. Widely extending savannahs are the characteristic features. There are only two seasons; during the dry season the country is arid, but when the rains set in it becomes covered with a luxuriant vegetation. K. has no perennial rivers, but merely a number of wadis, which contain more or less water in the rainy season. Cattle-rearing is one of the principal occupations of the inhabitants, and dukhn (Pennisetum typhoideum) is the chief agricultural product. The inhabitants are a mixed race, of Nubian, Arabian, and Negro origin. A large proportion of the population are slaves. The following tribes must be mentioned: the Radejat, Musabat, Konjara, Kababish, and Bagara. In the southern part of K. lies the important dist. of Takale, inhabited by people of the same name. Products of importance are ostrich feathers, ivory, ox hides, and gum of excellent quality. The principal imports are wheat, rice, sugar, salt, arrack, soap, and tobacco. The cap. of K. is El-Obeid (P. 30,000); other towns are Bara and Kadero. From 1820 to 1883 K. formed part of the Egyptian Sudan; at the present time it belongs to the Mahdi possessions. Area (including the district of Takale), 40,000 sq. m. P. estimated at 280,000. [H. G. S.]

Korea, kgd. of E. Asia, consisting of a large peninsula, about equal in size to Great Britain, extending S. from Manchuria, between 34° and 43° N., 124° 40′ and 130° 40′ E., separated from Japan by Strait of K. The W. and S. coasts are very irregular in outline, much indented, and lined with innumerable islands and extensive mud banks, whilst the E. coast is almost entirely devoid of harbours. The surface is everywhere mountainous, especially in the N.; a range of rugged mountains traverses the whole length of the peninsula, forming the back-bone of the country, generally nearer the E. coast, but in the S. trending to the W., and terminating at the SW. extremity, the highest point of which, however, is only 4500 ft. Owing to the position of the dividing range and the consequent slope of the country, the rivers nearly all drain to the W., the chief of which is the Amnok, or Yalu, forming part of the N. boundary; others are the Mokpho, Keum, Han, and Tai-dong. The geological formation is mainly of primitive rocks, granite, gneiss, and schists, whilst evidence of remote volcanic action is found in the vast fields of lava (one 40 m. long, with a depth of 100–140 ft.) which occur between Söul and Wönsan. The soil in the valleys is exceedingly fertile, but naturally stony, capable of bearing two crops in a year. The climate in summer, though hot, is greatly tempered by the sea-breezes, but the cold of winter is very severe. Rain falls only from June to September, and during the remainder of the year the sky is bright and clear. Tigers, leopards, bears, and deer are plentiful in the N., where dense thickets clothe the mountain sides, which is to a great extent wanting in the S.; pheasants, eagles, and wild fowl of all kinds abound; trout and salmon are plentiful in the streams on the NE. coast. The main industry is agriculture, carried on under disadvantages arising from the mountainous character of the country; in the S. and centre of the peninsula, where water is abundant and easily manageable, the lower valleys are utilised for rice, the higher portions for millet, beans, wheat, maize, cotton, hemp, and tobacco; further N. the rice fields give place to barley, oats, and potatoes. The country is believed to be rich in useful and valuable minerals, but they are little worked by the Koreans, and foreigners are not permitted to do so; gold is popularly supposed to exist everywhere in the peninsula, and 'placer' mining is carried on extensively, but few attempts are made to work quartz veins, and no effort whatever is made to reach the 'bed rock'; coal (not of good quality) is said to occur chiefly in the N.; and small quantities of silver, copper, and iron are also obtained. Manufactured goods are almost solely for domestic consumption. Native-grown cotton is largely used in making strong and warm though coarse cottons, and as padding for winter garments. Among other manufactures may be mentioned that of paper. There are no railways in the country, and but few roads; travelling is chiefly accomplished by ponies. Steamers have recently commenced running on the river Han, between Chemulpo and Söul, during the summer. Telegraphs connect the capital with Fusan, as also with the Siberian system by Wönsan and Vladivostok. Maritime commerce scarcely exists; almost all the foreign trade is in the hands of Japanese and Chinese, through the three treaty ports of Jenchuan (Chemulpo), Fusan, and Yuensan (Wönsan, or Gensan). On the W. coast navigation is difficult, owing to the violent tides, sometimes rising to 40 ft., and exposing the shipping to great danger, whilst the harbours are all frozen up during winter; and on the E. coast, which is generally free from ice, the only harbour is Wönsan, and that is not a good one. Exports consist chiefly of gold (£220,000), beans, cattle, and hides (together about £200,000), and ginseng, which is a monopoly of the king. Imports nearly £500,000, of which more than three-fifths are British and American cotton goods, the remainder being kerosine oil and sundries, the principal item in which is silk. The great cost of interior transport, arising from the want of practicable roads and the natural apathy and indolence of the Koreans, are great factors in preventing the development of the agricultural resources of the country. The N. portion of the peninsula is very sparsely inhabited; in the centre and S. the population is estimated to be about twice as dense; a steadily increasing immigration is taking place from China and Japan. Religion as a stimulating influence appears to have no existence, though many superstitious observances are attended to; the philosophy of the country is Confucian, but Buddhism is making progress, and its followers are numerous. The country is divided into eight provs. or 'do'; the capital is Söul, in the middle of the peninsula, near the W. coast; Fusan, on the SE. coast, is the only other town of importance. The govt. is a monarchy, formerly owning suzerainty to China. No official post can be held except by nobles, whilst trade or industry disqualifies nobles and their descendants from the privileges of their rank, and the distinction between the nobles and the middle and lower classes is very wide. The history of K. is of very great antiquity, records proving that it was already inhabited in the 12th century B.C. It was not, however, until about 1670 that Europe obtained its first knowledge of the country; but the independent and exclusive character of the Koreans prevented intercourse with any foreign nation until, in 1876, Japan (who had previously conquered the country in 1598) again invaded K., and treaty relations were established. This was followed in 1882 by a treaty of commerce with the U.S., and in the subsequent year with the countries of western Europe and Russia. In 1894 a war broke out in Korea between China and Japan, in consequence of misgovernment in K., and the refusal of China to co-operate with Japan in putting an end to the disorder. By the peace which concluded this war in 1895 [Japan] K. was declared independent. Area, about 90,000 sq. m. P. estimated at 8–12,000,000.

Kubañ (Kubanskaya Oblast), prov., Russia, N. Caucasia; has the Sea of Azov on W., the prov. of Don Cossacks on N., Stavropol and Terek on E., Kutais and the Black Sea on S.; includes, besides the basin of the Kubañ R., the narrow strip along the Black Sea coast, on the SW. slope of main Caucasus ridge, which at one time formed the Chernomorskiy Otdyel. It thus covers the W. part of the very fertile plains, 1000–2000 ft. high, which lie in the N. of the Caucasus; the low and marshy plains on SE. coast of Sea of Azov, including the terr. of Chernomorsk Cossacks; and the main Caucasus ridge from the Elbruz to its western extremity—the N. slope only till the long. of Gagry, and both slopes further W. The main Caucasus ridge, beginning with mountains 2000 ft. high at the Sea of Azov, gradually rises to 15,000 ft. in Oshtek peak, opposite Gagry, and remains snow-clad till it reaches 18,572 ft. in Elbruz. Only five passes lead across it. The S. part of K. prov. is occupied by the several parallel ridges of Black Mountains (Chornyia Gory) 3000–6000 ft. high. Watered by Kubañ R. and its tribs., Zelenchuk, Urup, Laba, and Byelaya (l. bk.); by several smaller rivers flowing into the Sea of Azov without reaching it; by the Yeya on N. frontier; and by upper course of Yegorlyk. Soil very fertile in the plains, many populous Cossack villages being seated along the Kubañ R. and on the surrounding flat lands. Considerable amounts of grain grown and exported; improved agricultural implements largely used. Extensive cattle breeding. Pop. thoroughly Russian (Little Russians, 51 per cent., Great Russians, 33 per cent.), the Cherkesses who inhabited the valleys of the main chain having been compelled to emigrate to Turkey (the Bashi-buzuks), and now numbering only 105,200; about 6000 each of Armenians and Jews. The Black Sea coast still remains unoccupied, and has only a few settlements at Anapa, Novorossiisk, and Gelenjik. Divided into seven dists. (otdyels): Ekaterinodar, cap. of prov., Batalpashinsk, Kavkazskiy, Laba, Maikop, Temryuk, Yeisk; and a separate military dist., Chernomorsk. Area, 39,277 sq. m. P., with Chernomorsk (1893), 1,587,500.

Kubañ (the Hipanis and Vardan of antiquity), riv., Russia, N. Caucasia, rises on NE. slope of main Caucasus ridge, at the foot of Elbruz, flows NW. and N. through narrow woody gorges, and after having pierced the mountain's ridge enters the plains at Batalpashinsk; turning then NW. and W. it enters the Black Sea by the Kyzyltash and Kubañ limans, forming a wide delta wherein the Kara-K. and Protoka are the chief branches. Navigation is possible on the last 150 m. of its course (till Tiflisskaya). Freezes in December, and opens early in March. Its chief tribs., Zelenchuk, Urup, and Laba, are from the left. Considerable fishing at its mouth. Length, 547 m.; area of basin, 21,500 sq. m.

Kubango, or Okavango, riv., S. Africa, rises E. of Benguella, in about 13° S., 16° E., flows S. and SE. to 18° S., where it turns abruptly to the E. and forms the boundary between the German and Portuguese possessions, after which its course is again S. and SE., where it takes the name of Tioge, or Tonke, and enters Lake Ngami at its NW. corner. Length, about 1000 m.

Kuenlun, mt. range, or series of ranges, in central Asia. According to Dr. Georg Wegener, it consists of six parallel chains extending from 75°–118° E. long., and from 30°–40° N. lat., having a length of 2390 m., with a maximum breadth of about 500 m. (See Zeit. der Gesell. für Erdkunde zu Berlin, vol. xxvi. No. 3.) But in the more ordinary acceptance of the name, referring to a huge chain connected with the Pamir plateau on the W., skirting the N. boundary of Kashmír, and thence, in the shape of a bow, forming the gigantic rampart of the highlands of N. Tibet, and terminating in the mountainous country about the sources of the Hwang-ho. It is of great elevation throughout, crossed by several passes ranging from 15,750–19,500 ft. The principal of these, in order from W. to E., are the Yangi from Kulunaldi to Kugiar and Kargalik; the Kilik, Kilian, and Sanju from Shahidula to Kargalik, Kilian, and Sanju respectively; the Hindu-tagh (below the highest known summit, 20,330 ft.) and the Ilchi from the upper Karakash valley to Khotan; and the Ghubolik Art pass leading from the Aksai Chin desert to Polu and Kiria; these are all in the W. portion. Beyond this occurs a long stretch of some 8° of long. still unexplored. Further E. it has been crossed by Carey near the meridian of 90° E. at an alt. of 14,000 ft., and by Przhevalsky and Carey near 94° E. by the Anghir-takshia Pass at 15,900 ft. In the W. the chain is broken through by the Zarafshan or Yarkand, the Karakash, and the Kiria Rivs., all flowing northwards into the basin of Lob Nor. The geological structure, as far as has been ascertained, is of very ancient date, and proves that the K. is one of the oldest parts of the continent.

Kurdistan, part of the ancient Assyria, an ethnographic region of western Asia, mostly between 34° and 40° N., 39° and 47° E., extending from, and embracing both the headstreams of the upper Euphrates and along the Russian border E. to Mount Ararat, the upper course of the Tigris, and all the mountainous country E. of this river to Lake Urumia, extending S. to Luristan; chiefly in the Turkish empire, and partly in Persia. According to Rawlinson, K. is divided into three regions: the first, extending from Kharput and Erzinggan to Lake Van, comprises distinct chains with a direction from W. to E., with fertile valleys, forming an undulating plateau bounded SW. by the Tigris, constituting a charming country, and containing several large towns. The second region, extending southwards from Lake Van, is essentially mountainous and of great elevation. The third comprises the Turkish dist. of Suleimanie and the Persian provs. of Ardelan and Kermanshah; here the country has its least breadth, and the mountains are more moderate in height, bounded on the E. by the fertile plains of Irak-Ajemi, and on the W. by those bordering the Tigris. The Kurds are a wild, pastoral race, and to a great extent nomadic; professedly Mohammedans of the Sunni sect. It is only in southern K., however, that the population is exclusively Kurdish, as north of Mosul there is also a large Christian population. Area about 74,000 sq. m. See The Geographical Journal, vol. iii. p. 81, with map, scale 1: 3,000,000.

Kutais, govt., Russia, Transcaucasia, on E. ct. of Black Sea, including the valley of the Rion, the SW. slopes of the main Caucasus ridge in the Sukhumkale div., and the newly annexed parts of Asiatic Turkey, in dists. Artvin and Batum; has the Russian provs. of Kubañ and Terek on N., Tiflis and Kars on E. and SE., Asiatic Turkey on SW., and Black Sea on W. Consists of several parts, very different in their physical characters: (a) the low and fertile valley of the Rion and the Kvirila (Imeretia and Mingrelia), between the main Caucasus ridge and the Anti-Caucasus, separated from the valley of the middle and lower Kura by the Meskhi ridge, which is crossed at Suram by the Poti-Baku Rly.; (b) the Alpine slopes of the main Caucasus ridge (Svanetia, Racha, Lechgum, and partly Samurzakan), which gradually rises from the lowlands to over 10,000 ft. high snow-clad peaks, and consists of a labyrinth of chains, with occasional broad valleys and plateaux; (c) the steep slopes of the main ridge towards the Black Sea in Sukhum region (Abhazia, Tsebilda), thickly clothed with forests, and leaving but a narrow inhabitable strip along the sea-coast, where beautiful fruit-gardens are now laid up; and (d) the high plateaux, over 5000 ft., of Adzhara (Ajara) and Lazistan, on the Transcaucasian plateau, falling steeply towards the Black Sea, in the Batum region. Watered by the Rion, with its tribs. Kvirila, Tskhenis-tskhali, and many others; the Ingur, Kodor, Bzeba, and many small streams in NW., and the Chorokh in SW. Coal is extracted at Tkvibuli, and porphyries in dist. Ozurgeti; promising naphtha wells have lately been discovered. Exports of manganese ore rapidly grown up (2,750,000 cwts.); copper, silver, and zinc ores. Climate very varied, but altogether distinguished by an exceedingly great amount of rain, often torrential. Dry and cold in the mountains. The average temps. are: Kutais (473 ft.), yr. 58°, Jan. 40°, July 73°, and very much the same at Poti and Sukhum; Batum, yr. 59°, Jan. 41.5°, July 75°; while at Suram (2394 ft.) they are: yr. 50°, Jan. 29°, July 68°. The yearly rainfall attains as much as 55.8 in. at Kutais, 65.7 in. at Poti, 81.4 in. at Sochi, and 94.1 in. at Batum. The land, which is mostly owned in very small plots, is well cultivated, parts of K. being as well utilised as in Italy. Population chiefly Georgian, Armenian (15,000), Tatars (29,000), Jews (8000), and Russians. Indian corn and wheat are the chief crops, the average crops being 866,000 quarters of Indian corn, and 65,000 quarters of wheat. Vineyards cover 80,000 ac.; some cotton-tree plantations; bee-culture; silkworm culture; beautiful forests; timber exported. Apart from kerosene refineries and a few saw-mills, there are no manufactures, but a variety of domestic trades is carried on in villages. Crossed by a railway from Poti and Batum to Tiflis and Baku, with branches to Tkvibuli coal-mines and Chiaturi. For administrative purposes, the three dists. (okrug) of Sukhum, Batum, and Artvin are under separate military governors. The remainder is divided into seven dists.: Batum, Zugdidi, Lechgum (chief town Lailashi), Ozurgeti, Racha, Sharopan, and Senakh. Area, 13,968 sq. m. P. (1890) 998,620.

Kwang-si, prov., S. China, between 22° and 26° N., 104° 40′ and 112° E., bordering on Tongking. It is almost entirely comprised in the basin of the Si-kiang [China, rivers], the main stream of which (the Hun-shui) traverses the centre of the prov. from W. to E. Surface mountainous, highest in the W. On the N. boundary the Nan-shan forms a series of parallel ridges, in which the Pingyi-shan reaches the perpetual snow-line. Climate is cold and humid, with great variations of temperature. The soil is not very fertile, and on the whole the country is poor. Mountains are covered with forests, producing valuable timber and cinnamon of excellent quality. The plains, which are confined to the narrow spaces bordering the rivers, are almost exclusively in the E. Gold, silver, copper, lead, and tin exist in the mountains, but are not worked to any advantage, except silver, near Kweichou; the country round Po-se is said to be one vast bed of coal. The prov. is one of the least densely populated in China; the people are mostly Chinese in the eastern plains, whilst the mountains are inhabited by the half-savage Miao-tse, who are quite independent of the Chinese government. In the W. the bulk of the population are Shans, the Chinese having been destroyed in the great Taiping rebellion. The chief articles of commerce are timber, indigo, sugar, and tea; but the foreign trade is very unimportant, owing to the poverty of the country, the hostility to foreigners, and the want of security. Cap. Kweilin-fu. Area, 77,220 sq. m. P. (estimated 1890) 5,200,000. See China, table.

Kwangtung, maritime prov., S. China, on the China Sea, with a very extensive coast-line extending to and bordering on Tongking, and comprising the large island of Hainan (q.v.). The coast is much indented by bays, affording excellent harbours, the principal being the Gulf of Canton or Canton R. (q.v.); and numerous small islands lie in proximity to the shores. Surface mountainous, traversed by several chains, generally parallel to the coast, whilst the Nan-shan forms all the N. boundary. The hydrographic system is well developed, and all parts of the prov. can be reached by navigable rivers and canals, which constitute the only ways of communication and commerce. Three large rivers intersect the prov. from W., N., and E., the Si-kiang, the Pe-kiang, and the Tung-kiang, which unite at the Canton R. by numerous arms and channels, forming a delta nearly 120 m. in extent. Climate very variable, following the alternations of the monsoons; humidity is in general very great, and in the delta, where there is much stagnant water in the channels, fever, dysentery, and other similar maladies are common. The soil of the mountainous regions, which form the greater part of the prov., is too stony for successful cultivation; the plains and valleys are fertile, and generally well cultivated. Two and three crops of corn are produced in the year, which, however, is not sufficient for the consumption: rice, tobacco, indigo, tea, fruits, and hemp are also cultivated, with sugar-cane in the E. The mountains are almost entirely destitute of wood, but mulberry trees are abundant in the S., and the production of silk is considerable. The larger wild animals are rare; birds and insects are numerous. Pigs, poultry, and bees are reared, also cattle, but only for agricultural employment. The coasts and rivers abound with fish, which furnish a great part of the subsistence of the people. Salt is made on the sea-shores. Coral fishery, and the capture of large turtles with shells of choice quality, is carried on. The mountains contain mines of copper, iron, mercury, silver, tin, and lead, which are all worked; precious stones, marble, and coal are also found. The foreign trade of China is well represented in K., containing the treaty ports of Canton (the cap.), Swatow, Pakhoi, and Kiungchow (Hainan), besides the two European colonies of Hong-kong and Macao. Area, 86,873 sq. m. P. (estimated 1890) 27,700,000. See China, table.

Africa, believed to issue from Lake Mussombo, in about 13½° S., flows first N. then W. by N. past Dondo till it enters the Atlantic in about 9° 21½′ S.; navigable for small craft from the Livingstone Falls in 9° 27½′ S., 14° 49′ E., a little above Dondo, to which there is a regular line of steamers from Loanda. At its mouth there is a shifting bar. Map of lower course from the Livingstone Falls downwards, Jour. R. G. S., 1876, p. 429 (about 1 : 310,000).

Kwara, riv., Africa. See Niger.

Kwathlamba Mountains, or Drakenbergen, a mountain system of SE. Africa, more than 500 m. in length, and running SW. to NE. from the Great Fish R. (31½° S. lat.) to the Olifant R. (24½° S. lat.). They form the water-parting between the rivers flowing to the Indian Ocean, S. of the Limpopo, and the Orange R. and its tribs. The Kwathlamba range is composed of high and picturesque mountains, sloping steeply towards the E., but gently towards the plateaux of the interior. They form three orographical divisions. The most southern of these is subdivided into the Zuurbergen and Strombergen (alt. about 6000 ft.). Then follows the central Kwathlamba range, forming a majestic mountain wall with steep ramparts and serrated crests. It contains the highest mountains of sub-tropical S. Africa, viz., the Mont aux Sources (11,150 ft.), the Champagne Castle (10,360 ft.), and the Giant's Peak (9640 ft.). Further NE. extends the third division, the Northern Drakenbergen, the highest points of which are Mount Malani and Mauch Spitze (both more than 7000 ft). [H. G. S.]

Kwa-vanuk, riv. mouth, Tongking, S. of the Doson Penin., in 20° 41′ N.

Kweichou, interior prov. of China, between 25° and 29° N., 104° and 109° 30′ E. Surface mountainous, traversed by several chains having a general direction SW. to NE., but not of very great elevation, except in the SE., where the Nan-ling forms part of the boundary with Kwangsi. It is chiefly in the basin of the Yangtse-kiang, its large trib., the Wu, rising in the SW. of the prov. and quitting it at the NE., but the S. portion is watered by affluents of the Si-kiang. Climate temperate but very unequal, and in general insalubrious; the stagnant waters and the marshes which are formed where the rivers have an insufficient slope produce fevers in their vicinity. Wheat and maize are the principal crops, with tea (in the W.), opium, and tobacco; but in general agriculture is less developed in this prov. than in any other part of China. The horses, however, have a reputation. The mineral riches are considerable, but scarcely utilised; iron is extracted in the valley of the Wu, which is also rich in coal, but only worked in the neighbourhood W. of the cap., where large iron-works have recently been established; copper is obtained in the vicinity of Kanchui; mercury was formerly a principal article of commerce, but in consequence of political troubles and the flooding of the mines they are now abandoned; gold, silver, tin, and lead exist. The prov. is the poorest and one of the most sparsely populated in China, composed of Chinese in the plains and valleys, and various tribes of Miaotse in the mountains. The S. is inhabited principally by Shans, nearly all the Chinese having been destroyed in the Taiping rebellion. Cap. Kweiyang-fu. Area, 67,182 sq. m. P. (estimated 1890) 7,700,000. See China, table.

Labrador' (Portuguese Terra de Lavradores, 'slave coast,' see below), a vast penin. of Brit. N. America, between 50° and 62° 30′ N., 55° 37′ and 79° W., bounded on the E. by the Atlantic Ocean, N. by Hudson Strait, W. by Hudson and James Bays, SE. by the gulf and riv. St. Lawrence, and approximately on the SW. by the Rupert and Saguenay Rivs. The greater part of this immense area, about equal to the British Isles, France, and Germany combined, is included within the terr. of the dominion of Canada; but the Atlantic coast, from Salmon R. in the Strait of Belle Isle N. to Cape Chidley, is under the administration of Newfoundland. All the E. coast is very irregular, indented with a great number of superb natural harbours, and fringed with innumerable small islands and rocks; the other coasts are more regular in outline, but good barbours exist generally. The interior is almost entirely unexplored; it consists of a vast tableland, probably more than 2000 ft. above the sea, sloping on all sides to the coasts, but more gently to the W. and N.; all the S. part of the penin. is extremely well watered, and the whole interior contains many large lakes. The coasts have a dreary, desolate appearance, with nothing but bare rocks and occasionally a little stunted grass; but at a distance of not more than 12 m. inland there commences a luxuriant forest growth, which clothes the whole country, except in some places towards the N. Climate on the E. coast is very bleak and severe, but less foggy than Newfoundland, and completely ice-bound throughout the winter; the summer, which lasts from the middle of June to the middle of September, is pleasant. The country is very thinly peopled, but a considerable number of Cree Indians are found in the interior, who lead a nomadic life, spending a few weeks in the spring at the Hudson Bay Co.'s posts near the coasts. In the E. a large number of Eskimo are settled, but they are seldom found further S. than Hamilton Inlet; a few British and Newfoundland emigrants are established also on the E. and S. coasts, whose numbers are increased very largely during the cod and salmon fishing season in the summer by fishermen from Newfoundland. Many fur-bearing animals and cariboo still exist, but not to the same extent as formerly. Mineral ores are found here and there near the coast; graphite occurs on Zach I., and valuable copper-mines are worked at Tilt Cove, and iron is known to exist. L. was discovered by Cabot in 1497, and rediscovered by G. de Corte Real (1501), to whom the name is due, the natives, on account of their strength, being capable of becoming excellent slaves. According to an old map in the ducal library at Wolfenbüttel, however, the name is said to be due to a farmer (labrador) of the Azores, to whose information the discovery of the land was due. (See Scot. Geog. Mag., 1894, p. 263.) It is possible that the country was visited by the Northmen in the 9th and following centuries. The Hudson Bay Co. have several trading settlements on the S., E., and W. coasts, and on the E. ct. the Moravian Mission has stations at Hebron, Okak, Nain, Zoar, and Hopedale; and the Church of England, mission houses at Sandwich Harbour and Battle Harbour. Mail communication is carried on during the summer by steamers from Newfoundland along the E. ct. to Nain. Area about 530,000 sq. m. See Proc. R. G. S., 1888, p. 189, with map, p. 260.

Labuan ('anchor' or 'port' island, from Malay and Javanese labuh, 'to let fall,' namely, the anchor), a small island off the NW. ct. of Borneo, about 6 m. distant, in 5° 16′ N. It is flat and well-wooded, with excellent water in abundance, and possesses extensive coal-measures, which are profitably worked. Victoria Harbour, on its SE. side, affords good anchorage in 5–6 fathoms. Sago-flour is the principal production. It was ceded to Great Britain by the Sultan of Borneo in 1844, and remained a crown colony until 1890, when it was transferred to the Brit. N. Borneo Co. The island is now connected by submarine cable with Singapore, and the connection is to be continued to Hong-kong. Area, 30 sq. m. P. 6000.

Laccadive Islands (Sanskrit Laksha dwipa, 'the hundred thousand islands'), a group of low islands in the Indian Ocean, extending between 10° and 14° N., 71° 40′ and 74° E., at an average distance of 200 m. W. of the Malabar coast. They consist of 14 principal isles, of coral formation. Around each island coral reef extends, forming a lagoon where coir (coco-nut fibre) may be soaked without danger of washing away. The entire product of coir is sold at a fixed price to the Madras government (from the N. group), to the Rájá of Cannanore (from the S. group). Other principal products are jaggery, coco and betel nuts, with some rice, sweet potatoes, and small cattle. The islands were annexed to the Madras Presidency in 1875. Area vaguely estimated at 80 sq. m. P. (1891) 14,400 (all Moham.).

St. Petersburg, Olonets, and Viborg, 59° 56′–61° 46′ N., 29° 53′–32° 50′ E.; four-sided, elongated from NW. to SE., with rocky shores on NW., fringed by numerous small islands (largest, Valaam and Konevets), and marshy flat shores in S. and SE. No less than sixty rivers enter it, the largest being Volkhov, outlet of Lake Ilmeń, Svir′ from Lake Onega, Wuoxen and Taipala from the Saima system of lakes of Finland, Syas′ from small lakes of Valdai plateau. Its outlet is the Neva (104,000 cubic ft. per second). Begins to freeze in October, all frozen in December; under ice till end of March, part of ice being discharged through the Neva; navigable for 180 days. Fauna bears arctic character. Considerable fishing. Steamers ply from St. Petersburg to the Valaam and Konevets monasteries, and to Petrozavodsk up the Svir′. The rivers Volkhov, Syas′, and Svir′ being parts of the canals which unite the Volga with the Neva (see Volga), and navigation on Lake L. being dangerous on account of storms, a canal 70 m. long connects the mouths of the three rivers with the Neva. Shores scantily peopled (Schlüsselburg, New Ladoga, Kexholm, and Serdobol). Area, 7000 sq. m.; alt. 55 ft.; maximum depth, 122 fathoms; average, 50 fathoms.

Lagos, Brit. colony on the Slave Coast in Upper Guinea, W. of the British Niger-Benue possessions. L. is the centre of the W. African palm-oil trade, the principal place being the town of L., the cap. of the colony. It is the largest and most important trading-place of Upper Guinea. The principal exports are palm-oil, palm-nut kernels, ivory, cotton, and gum copal; the principal imports are spirits, textiles, tobacco, and hardware. The commerce of L. is chiefly in the hands of British, German, and French merchants, but very few whites live in the colony, owing to the unhealthiness of the climate. L. has direct steamship connections with London, Liverpool, and Hamburg. The colony was founded in 1861, and has made rapid strides since that time, the annual value of the exports being at present more than £500,000, and that of the imports about £440,000. Area, 1068 sq. m. P. (1870) 27,000; (1891) 85,000 (including 120 whites). [H. G. S.]

Lan'arkshire, inland co., in the SW. of Scot., the most populous in the country, comprising the greater part of the basin of the Clyde above Renfrew, the principal tribs. of the Clyde within the county being the Douglas, Avon, and Calder, together with the Kelvin, the lower part of which is partly on the N. frontier. The surface is very varied, generally speaking, rising from the NW. to the S. and SE. The Lowther Hills border the county in the SW., and two of their principal heights (Green Lowther, 2403 ft., and Ballencleuch Law, 2267 ft.) occur within its boundary line. Clydesdale (q.v.) is noted for its fertility, but beyond its limits the soil is generally moist, marshy, and barren, with the exception of the excellent moorland pastures of the Upper Ward. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 10–12. The geological structure is very varied, especially in the highland dists. in the S. and W., where, however, most of the rocks are of Old Red Sandstone, and Lower Carboniferous rocks, intermingled with igneous rocks of Lower Carboniferous age, prevail; but the growing wealth of the county, and its rapid increase in population since the beginning of the present century [Scotland, table], are almost entirely due to the extensive development of the coal-measures, which contain also extensive deposits of ironstone and fireclay in the northern half of the county. The county produces more than half the coal raised in Scotland, and a large proportion of the ironstone, besides benefiting by the large quantities of the latter mineral produced in the adjoining parts of Dumbartonshire and Ayrshire. The ironstone is largely what is known as 'black band,' an ore producing iron of excellent quality, and so rich in carbonaceous matter as not to require the addition of coal in the operation of roasting preliminary to that of smelting. The principal mining region of the county is in the extreme N., and is divided into three dists.: that of Glasgow in the W., that of Baillieston and Shettleston in the middle, and that of Airdrie and Coatbridge in the E. The first abounds in ironstone, the two others in fireclay, and limestone is largely obtained in the eastern dist. The only other mineral of importance is the lead ore, which has long been mined on the southern boundary of the county (Leadhills, Abington). The mineral wealth of the county has given rise to extensive manufactures. Iron ore is smelted at Glasgow, Govan, Hamilton, Motherwell, Wishaw, Newmains, Rutherglen, Bothwell, Airdrie, Coatbridge, and Shotts. All kinds of iron-works, including iron and steel shipbuilding, are carried on at Glasgow, which has also extensive textile industries. The main railway lines are the North British and Caledonian, which have branches, too numerous to mention, for the extensive traffic incidental to the mineral and commercial importance of the county. The chief towns are Glasgow, Govan, Partick, Coatbridge, Hamilton, Airdrie, Motherwell, Wishaw, and Rutherglen; parl. burghs, Glasgow, Airdrie, Hamilton, Rutherglen, and Lanark; royal burghs, Glasgow, Lanark, Rutherglen. The parl. divs. of the county (exclusive of Glasgow and other parl. burghs) are:—

Lancashire (lang'ka-sher), maritime and palatine co., Eng., having N. Cumberland and Westmorland, E. Yorkshire, S. Cheshire, and W. the Irish Sea, an arm of which (Morecambe Bay) divides it into two unequal parts, the northern and smaller area constituting the Furness dist. Mainly in the dioceses of Manchester, Liverpool, and Carlisle, but partly in those of Chester, Ripon, and Wakefield. The parl. bors. are Liverpool, Manchester, Salford, Blackburn, Oldham, Bolton, Preston, Barrow-in-Furness, Burnley, Bury, Rochdale, St. Helen's, Wigan, also Ashton-under-Lyne and Warrington partly in Cheshire, and Stalybridge and Stockport mainly in Cheshire. Of the eighteen mun. bors., those of Liverpool, Manchester, Salford, Oldham, Blackburn, Bolton, and Preston have a population exceeding 100,000. The parl. divs. of the county are as follows:—

1 The administrative county of Lancaster (which includes parts of Mossley and Warrington, belonging to the ancient counties of York and Chester, and excludes parts of Stalybridge and Stockport, assigned to the administrative county of Chester, and part of Todmorden, assigned to that of York) has an area of 1,202,726 ac., and a population of 3,906,721.

Surface rugged and mountainous in the N., where in Coniston Fells the 'Old Man' rises to 2633 ft. above the sea, and on the E. border, where the long ridge of the Pennine chain separates the county from York; elsewhere generally level. Often deficient in trees, and in a few parts containing extensive bogs and mosses. Principal rivers the Duddon, Leven, Lune, Wyre, Ribble, Mersey, and Irwell. The northern and detached portion of the county is bounded in the NE. by Windermere Lake, and contains also that of Coniston. Windermere is partly in this county, which contains also Coniston Lake. Climate mild, but very humid. Carboniferous sandstone and New Red Sandstone, with limestone, form the principal strata of the county. Soil among the hills moorish or peaty, in the lower dist. mostly a fertile sandy loam. For agricultural statistics, see Appendix, pp. 7–9. The most important mineral is coal, to the abundance of which the county mainly owes its manufacturing eminence. The L. coalfield is estimated to extend over nearly 400 sq. m., lying almost entirely S. of the Ribble; but there is a small detached coalfield on the Lune, near the E. frontier of the county (SW. of Ingleborough Fell). Besides coal the county is rich in iron ore, valuable deposits of red hematite being worked in the Furness dist. (at Barrow, Asleham, Lindal, and Dalton). A small quantity of copper ore is mined at Coniston, an oxide of iron for the making of pigments as well as the production of iron at Carnforth. Slate is quarried at Coniston, Kirby, Lowick, and other places in the N.; flag and other paving-stones are quarried at Whitworth, Haslingden, Darwen, and other places near the Pennine chain; stoneware clay and fireclay at St. Helen's. Brine is pumped for salt-making at Preesall, near Fleetwood. The principal manufactures of L. are carried on in the towns belonging to the great coalfield, this region being the seat of the most extensive cotton industry in the world, cotton-spinning becoming more and more centred in the Oldham dist. (See also Manchester.) There is also an extensive iron industry. Iron ore is largely smelted both in the principal coal-mining towns in the S. (Wigan, Darwen, &c.), and in the iron-mining region of Furness, where Barrow is noted for its iron-works generally, including shipbuilding. Widnes is the chief centre of the alkali industry; St. Helen's one of the chief seats of the English glass industry; Liverpool, Warrington, and other towns in the SW. have extensive soap works, and in the same region are large candle works and other industries connected with the oil-trade. The L. & NW., M., and L. & Y. Rlys., and some local lines, connect the great towns with the manufacturing dists. of Yorkshire and all other parts of England and Scotland. Canals connect SW. Lancashire both with Yorkshire and the midland counties [England, rivers], and a very important addition to the means of communication has been made by the construction of the Manchester Ship Canal (q.v.). L. was the seat of the Brigantes and Voluntii in the Roman Maxima Cæsariensis, and part of Northumbria became, in honour of the Conquest, an earldom (Henry III.) under Edmund Crouchback, a duchy and palatinate under Edward III.'s son, John of Gaunt, and since Edward IV. has been held by the sovereign, with a separate court.

Liverpool, in the diocese of Manchester, on the L. & NW. and M. Rlys., and connected by canals with Preston and Kendal. The harbour has 1700 ft. of quayage (with a depth at ordinary spring tides of 12 ft., ordinary neap 4 ft.); but the port also includes Glasson Dock (q.v.), 5 m. SW. The manufactures are cabinet-making and upholstery, table baize, cotton goods, and railway waggons. A fortress was erected here by the Romans, and the keep of the present castle was erected by Roger de Poitou (by whom the parish church was also founded) in the time of William the Conqueror. Landes, natural region in the SW. of France, in the dep. of Landes, Gironde, and to a small extent in the SW. of Lot-et-Garonne, forming a vast triangular plateau bounded W. by the Atlantic, SE. by the Adour, Midouze, and Douze, and NE. by the Ciron and Garonne, apparently level, but actually sloping towards the boundary line in each direction. The dist., which was formerly submerged, is covered with sand of the Pliocene period, bordered toward the sea by sand-dunes thrown up by the action of the wind, and extending for a distance of 120 m. over an area estimated at more than 220,000 ac., or 366 sq. m. These dunes in many places reach a height of 250 ft.; but slightly below the surface the infiltration of tannin and other organic substances converts the sand into a layer of sandstone, to which the name of alios is given. Brémontier, at the end of the 18th century, recommended the reafforestation of the coast-zone as the best means of checking the spread of the dunes. To a large extent this has been successfully done, 730,000 ac. of waste land having been reclaimed by the plantation of the maritime pine and vineyards, for which latter the region is all the better fitted, since the phylloxera does not thrive there. Private owners have dealt in the same way with 875,000 ac. The deal of Landes is in great request for railway sleepers and telegraph posts; but the principal revenue is derived from the turpentine yield. Since the draining of the marshlands the dist., formerly the most unhealthy, has become one of the healthiest in France.

Landes, littoral dep. in the SW. of France, bounded W. by the Atlantic, E. by deps. Lot-et-Garonne and Gers, N. by Gironde, and S. by Basses-Pyrénées; divided into three arrs.—Mont-de-Marsan (cap.), Saint-Sever, and Dax—and physically, by the Adour, into the two very distinct regions of Landes (see previous article) and Chalosse (occupied by the foot-hills of the Pyrénées). The chief river is the Adour, which runs for half of its course in, and drains more than half the area of, the dep., which belongs, however, in the NE. and N. to the basins of the Garonne and Leyre. At a short distance from the coast occur étangs similar to those of Gironde, to which they form the southern continuation. The largest are in the NW. of the dep., the étangs de Cazau and Biscarosse. The principal cereals are maize, wheat, and rye; the vine occupies less than two per cent. of the surface. The slopes of La Chalosse are planted with vineyards and oak-plantations, and its great ravines with wheat, maize, fodder-crops, and forests. As a forest dep. L. ranks first in France. The chief mineral is rock-salt, from the mines at Dax and Lescourre. There are numerous mineral springs at Dax, Tercis, Pouillon, &c. The most important manufacture is that of resin and its derivatives. Area, 3615 sq. m. P. 297,300. See France, table.
